respect of official acts carried out while they were in office. A former head of State continues to be entitled to the latter after he has left office but it is far less extensive than the personal immunity enjoyed by an incumbent head of State. The differences between these two types of immunity are discussed in section 1 above.

Personal immunity of incumbent head of State

(a) Criminal proceedings

It has long been accepted that, under customary international law, a serving head of State enjoys absolute immunity from the criminal jurisdiction of foreign courts.[191] Moreover, the ICJ has held that this type of immunity applies not only in relation to official acts but also in relation to private acts and regardless of whether the head of State is on official business or on a private visit.[192] Similarly, the immunity will apply whether the act concerned was carried out before the head of State assumed office or during the period of office.[193] The extensive nature of a sitting head of State's personal immunity in this regard has long been acknowledged by national courts. In 1989 the Swiss Supreme Court agreed with the following proposition:

> Heads of State are absolutely exempt ratione personae from all measures of constraint and exercise of jurisdiction on the part of a foreign State for acts committed by them, anywhere in the world, in the exercise of their official functions. By contrast with immunity from civil jurisdiction... immunity from criminal jurisdiction of heads of State is absolute... This immunity would appear to cover, without reservation, to private acts.[194]

The ICJ's conclusion in Arrest Warrant of 11 April 2000 (DRC v Belgium) was based upon the view that such full immunity is necessary to protect the head of State against any act of authority of another State which would hinder that individual in the performance of his or her duties. Before that decision, it had been argued that an exception to this rule of absolute inviolability and immunity from criminal jurisdiction should be accepted in the case of serious crimes under international law. However, the relatively sparse State practice that existed did not support such a contention and, even in the Pinochet case, where an exception was admitted to the functional immunity enjoyed by a former head of State in relation to the crime of torture, the Court emphasized that the personal immunity to which an incumbent head of State was

Facts

F1 This case originated from the 19 September 1989 bomb attack committed against a DC 10 aircraft operated by the French company UTA that killed 170 people, including several French nationals, above the Tenere desert. After a judicial investigation in France, six Libyan nationals were committed for trial. In Judgment, 10 March 2001, the Paris Assize Court sentenced them in absentia to life imprisonment and ordered them to pay compensation to members of the victims' families who had participated in the trial as civil parties.

F2 On 16 June 1999, a civil-party complaint was lodged against Colonel Muammar Gaddafi, the Libyan head of state, for complicity in the bomb attack. On 6 October 1999, the investigating judge ruled that there was a case to answer and decided to bring a case against Gaddafi for complicity in destruction of property by use of an explosive substance which caused loss of life in relation to a terrorist conspiracy.

F3 The prosecutor's office applied for review of the investigating judge's decision in Judgment, 20 October 2000 and upheld the decision to proceed with the case. The court of appeal recognized that a head of state enjoyed immunity from jurisdiction. However, it considered that the principle of immunity for heads of state had, since the end of World War II, undergone some modifications which would indicate that it was no longer absolute, and admitted exceptions when the act committed would not be considered part of the normal duties of heads of state. Considering the nature and gravity of the crime charged, the court of appeal ruled that Colonel Gaddafi, though an incumbent head of state, could not enjoy immunity from jurisdiction, and it remitted the case for trial.

F4 The general prosecutor at the Court of Appeal of Paris filed an appeal on a point of law with the court of cassation, arguing that the court of appeal had misinterpreted international law. The general prosecutor argued that immunity from jurisdiction was an absolute principle for incumbent heads of state and that no exception could be made to it—however grave the crime charged.

Held

H1 Sitting foreign heads of state enjoyed immunity from jurisdiction before French courts by application of customary international law. The crime charged in this case, regardless of its gravity, did not constitute an exception to the principle of immunity from jurisdiction internationally recognized for incumbent heads of state in foreign courts. (paragraph 9)

H2 The court of appeal had misinterpreted international law by recognizing an exception to this principle in light of the gravity of the crime alleged. As a consequence, its judgment was quashed. (paragraph 9)

H3 There was no ground to proceed further with the case. (paragraph 11)

Analysis

A1 France, being a civil law country, mainly relies on written law; it is generally reluctant vis-à-vis customary law. As far as criminal law is concerned, France attaches great importance to the principle of nullum crimen sine lege, nulla poena sine lege praevia. As a result, French criminal courts are even more reluctant when it comes to the application of customary rules (Roulot, p 2631 Find it in your Library and Massé, p 898 Find it in your Library, see Further Analysis).

A2 In this case, the court of cassation, the final instance for civil and criminal matters, did apply customary law. The apparent audacity of the court of cassation should not, however, be overestimated. This case referred to a procedural matter, not to substantive law. It is not clear whether the court's willingness to apply customary law would extend to substantive rules—see Michel Massé, 'La coutume internationale dans la jurisprudence de la chambre criminelle—(Affaire Kadhafi et Aussarès)', (2003–4) Revue de science criminelle et de droit pénal comparé 894 p 402 Find it in your Library; and also The Movement Against Racism and for Peoples' Friendship v Aussaresses, Appeal no 02-80719, Decision no 122; ILDC 775 (FR 2003), 17 June 2003.

A3 Treaties and conventions come under Article 55 of the Constitution, 4 October 1958 (France), which provides that, when regularly ratified and published, treaties and conventions prevail over statutory law. The Constitution remained silent as to the reception of international customary law, but the Preamble of the Constitution, 1946 (France) ('1946 Constitution') which is referenced in the Constitution and has been declared by the French Constitutional Court as having constitutional value, provides in Article 14 of the 1946 Constitution that France, faithful to its traditions, abides by rules of international law. Article 14 could be a constitutional ground for the application of international customary law by a French court (Roulot, p 2632 Find it in your Library, see Further Analysis).

A4 In this case, the main bone of contention between the court of appeal and the court of cassation did not lie in the recognition of the principle of immunity from jurisdiction of a head of state, but in its exceptions.

A5 For the Paris Court of Appeal, immunity from jurisdiction was no longer absolute and conduct that could not be attached to the normal duties of a head of state prevented the head of state from enjoying the protection given to him by international law. According to the court of appeal, new international obligations have been created for states, among which is the obligation to judge international criminals regardless of their position. The court of appeal concluded that there were accordingly exceptions to the principle of immunity from jurisdiction.

A6 The court of cassation took a different approach, ruling that, at the time of the decision, the alleged crime had not been an exception to the principle of immunity from jurisdiction of foreign incumbent heads of state. The court of cassation did not say, however, that immunity from jurisdiction of foreign heads of state was absolute, but that an exception had to be established under international law. It added that immunity applied only to incumbent heads of state.

A7 The decision of the French Supreme Court later found support in the Yerodia case, Congo, Democratic Republic of the v Belgium, (2002) ICJ 121, 11 April 2000 ('Yerodia case'), in which the International Court of Justice held that immunity from jurisdiction for state officials was absolute and protected them against 'any act of authority of another State which would hinder him or her in the performance of his or her duties' (Yerodia case (54)). It added that 'no distinction can be drawn between acts performed by a Minister for Foreign Affairs in an "official" capacity", and those claimed to have been performed in a "private capacity…"' (Yerodia case (55)). This holding thus supported the conclusion that the exception applied by the Paris Court of Appeal had no basis in international law.

A8 The decision of the court of cassation appeared audacious for applying international customary law in a civil law country usually reluctant to do so. Despite criticisms from victims' associations and NGOs (see eg FIDH, 13 March 2001, this decision also appeared right in that it applied the correct legal regime of the international customary principle at issue.

A9 On 11 September 2001, an application was filed with the European Court of Human Rights, on the ground that that this judgment had violated their right of access to a court. A chamber relinquished jurisdiction to the Grand Chamber. On 9 January 2004, before the Grand Chamber had considered the case, an agreement was signed between the Gaddafi International Foundation for Charity Associations, the families of the victims, and the Bank for Official Deposits, which provided for compensation. In view of the agreement and the fact that six Libyan officials had been convicted, the court struck the case from the list on the basis of Article 37(1) (c) of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (4 November 1950) 213 UNTS 222; 312 ETS 5, entered into force 3 September 1953. (See Agreement between the Gaddafi International Foundation for Charity Associations, SOS attentats, the victim's family, and the Bank for Official Deposits, 9 January 2004.)

MARCOS AND MARCOS v. FEDERAL DEPARTMENT OF POLICE

Switzerland, Federal Tribunal. 2 November 1989

SUMMARY: The facts:—The United States authorities instituted proceedings against Ferdinand Marcos, former President of the Philippines, and his wife Imelda, who had been a Minister in the Philippine Government. They were accused of having abused their positions to acquire for themselves public funds and works of art. In 1988 a request for mutual legal assistance was sent by the United States authorities to their Swiss counterparts seeking, in particular, to obtain banking and other documents in order to clarify the nature of certain transactions which were the subject of investigation. Marcos and his wife objected to the request, arguing that the United States authorities had no jurisdiction to institute proceedings against them. Their objection was rejected and they lodged an administrative law appeal before the Federal Tribunal.

Held:—The appeal was dismissed.

(1) In an earlier judgment of 1 July 1987[1] also concerning former President Marcos, the Federal Tribunal had held that the immunity from execution enjoyed by a Head of State could not be relied upon once he was no longer in office since that immunity was a privilege granted in the interests of that State and could not be invoked for personal reasons against the interests of the State concerned (pp. 200-1).

(2) Under customary international law, heads of State and their families enjoyed absolute immunity from criminal jurisdiction which, by contrast with immunity from civil jurisdiction, was not restricted to acts performed jure imperii. It appeared that immunity from criminal jurisdiction covered all the private activities of Heads of State. Whilst this immunity of Heads of State had not been codified in the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations, 1961, which applied only to heads of missions and other diplomatic staff, there was no evidence from other treaties concluded under the auspices of the United Nations of any intent to grant lesser protection to foreign Heads of State than to diplomatic representatives. Accordingly, Articles 32 and 39 of the Vienna Convention were applicable by analogy to Heads of State, limiting their immunity to the period for which the sending State was prepared to grant it (possibility of express waiver) and to the duration of their functions (acts performed in the exercise of official functions, however, continued to be covered by immunity) (pp. 201-3).

(3) The immunity in relation to their functions enjoyed by the appellants therefore subsisted for those criminal acts allegedly committed while they were still exercising their powers in the Philippines. Accordingly, the proceedings in the United States courts could only be pursued because the State of the Philippines had expressly waived the immunity of Mr and Mrs Marcos. The Federal Tribunal had therefore enquired into the position and ascertained from the Swiss authorities that the Philippine Foreign Ministry had written a note verbale to the United States Embassy in Manila in October 1988, stating that the Philippine Government waived all State and diplomatic immunity, as well as the immunity of Head of State, which former President Marcos and his wife might enjoy or have enjoyed under American or international law. The note verbale also stated that the Philippine Government considered that the appellants should not be able to benefit from the doctrine of act of State in the United States. This declaration, emanating from one of the organs of the Philippine Government, was decisive. It was not the task of the Federal Tribunal to resolve questions of the procedural correctness of the waiver from the standpoint of Philippine law or the scope which it might be given by the United States courts (pp. 203-5).

The following is the text of the judgment of the Court:

On 2 February 1988 the United States Department of Justice communicated to the [Swiss] Federal Office of Police a request for international mutual assistance in a criminal matter based on the Treaty concluded on 25 May 1973 between the Swiss Confederation and the United States of America (hereafter "the Treaty"). This request was made for the purposes of an enquiry instituted by the United States Public Prosecutor for the State of New York against, inter alia, Ferdinand and Imelda Marcos, Philippine citizens who had been resident in Honolulu in Hawaii since February 1986. The offences being investigated consisted in the diversion of large amounts of funds (in particular an unlawful repayment of Philippine treasury bonds) and works of art (paintings from the "Samuels collection") which Marcos and his wife allegedly committed to the detriment of the United States of America and the Republic of the Philippines between 1981 and 1986, while they were respectively the President of the Republic and Minister for Social Affairs and Governor of the Metropolitan District of Manila.

The requesting State asked, in particular, that Switzerland should obtain for it documents held in banking, fiduciary and brokerage institutions based in Geneva, in order to facilitate clarification of the nature of transactions which were the subject matter of the enquiry by the United States Public Prosecutor.

The Federal Office having decided to consider the request for mutual assistance, Marcos and his wife lodged an objection arguing, inter alia, that the American authorities had no jurisdiction to institute proceedings in relation to the offences alleged in the request for mutual assistance. This objection was rejected and Marcos and his wife then lodged an administrative law appeal before the Federal Tribunal.

In the course of the proceedings, the Federal Office was asked to verify whether the requesting State was in possession of a declaration made by the competent authorities of the Republic of the Philippines with regard to the waiver of the immunity of President and Mrs Marcos. The Federal Office of Police lodged with the Court a diplomatic note of 17 October 1988 addressed to the Embassy of the United States in Manila, whose text will be reproduced below to the extent necessary.

The Federal Tribunal allowed the administrative law appeal in part, accepting the request for mutual assistance to the extent that it related to the prosecution of offences consisting in the repayment of Philippine treasury bonds and the appropriation of paintings belonging to the Republic of the Philippines and situated on the territory of the United States.

From the grounds of the judgment

5.—The appellants dispute the jurisdiction of the requesting State by invoking the immunity which they claim to enjoy as the former leaders of a foreign State.

(a) In the judgment of principle rendered on 1 July 1987,[2] on the basis of an administrative law appeal lodged by President and Mrs Marcos against provisional measures adopted in accordance with Article 18 of the Federal Law on International Mutual Assistance in Criminal Matters (EIMP), following a request for mutual assistance by the Republic of the Philippines, the Federal Tribunal has already considered the scope of the personal immunity recognized to heads of State under international law. The Court pointed out that such personal immunity is the counterpart of the immunity enjoyed by a foreign State acting jure imperii, that is to say in the exercise of its sovereign powers. The Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations of 18 April 1961 (hereafter the Vienna Convention) simply codifies a concept based on customary international law. In that decision the Federal Tribunal was concerned with the immunity from execution which a former Head of State and his wife sought to rely upon against the State which they had governed. The Federal Tribunal considered that such immunity was a privilege granted in the interests of that State and that it would be contrary to the whole system if an individual who was no longer responsible for representing a State could nevertheless invoke his personal immunity against the very interests of that State. In the same judgment, the Federal Tribunal held that it was not for the requested State to decide whether or not a former Head of State, following his removal from office, should still be given the benefit of immunity guaranteed to him by the law of his country for official acts performed in the exercise of his mandate. That question could only be resolved in the light of the independent municipal law of the requesting State (ATF 113 Ib 275, ground 7).[3]

(b) In the present case, the question at issue is whether or not the appellants enjoy immunity from criminal jurisdiction constituting an obstacle to the proceedings which the Government of the United States of America intends to institute against them in relation to acts which they committed in the performance of their official functions as office bearers in the Republic of the Philippines.

According to the case law of the Swiss Federal Tribunal concerning the jurisdictional immunity of foreign States, the principles of international law form an integral part of Swiss municipal law. The Swiss courts therefore apply the rules of customary international law in the same manner as if they were contained in an international treaty (ATF 106 Ia 142;[4] 82 I 75;[5] 56 I 237;[6] cf. Egli, L'immunité de juridiction et d'exécution des Etats étrangers et de leurs agents dans la jurisprudence du Tribunal Fédéral, Centenaire de la LP, Zurich, 1989, p. 201 et seq., especially pp. 202-3; Caflisch, La pratique suisse en matière de droit international public, 1983, p. 183).

Customary international law has always granted to Heads of State, as well as to the members of their family and their household visiting a foreign State, the privileges of personal inviolability and immunity from criminal jurisdiction (Seidl-Hohenveldern, Völkerrecht, 6th ed., Cologne, 1987, p. 303 et seq.). This jurisdictional immunity is also granted to a Head of State who is visiting a foreign State in a private capacity and also extends, in such circumstances, to the closest accompanying family members as well as to the senior members of his household staff. Accordingly, such persons cannot be the subject of criminal proceedings or even of a summons to appear before a court (Caflisch, op. cit., p. 183). Customary public international law grants such privileges ratione personae to Heads of State as much to take account of their functions and symbolic embodiment of sovereignty as by reason of their representative character in inter-State relations.

Although the theory of extraterritoriality has long been criticized and abandoned as the justification for the immunity of Heads of State or diplomatic agents (Quoc Dinh, Daillier and Pellet, Droit international public, 3rd ed., Paris, 1987, p. 661), Heads of State are absolutely exempt ratione personae from all measures of constraint and any exercise of jurisdiction on the part of a foreign State for acts committed by them, anywhere in the world, in the exercise of their official functions. By contrast with immunity from civil jurisdiction, which has constantly been a source of discussion and restriction, the immunity from criminal jurisdiction of Heads of State is absolute (Cahier, Le droit diplomatique contemporain, 2nd ed., in Publications de l'Institut Universitaire des Hautes Etudes Internationales, No 40, Geneva, 1964, pp. 333 et seq., especially pp. 338-9; Delbrück and Wolfrun, Völkerrecht, vol. I/1, Berlin and New York 1989, pp. 253 et seq.). This immunity would also appear to cover, without reservation, the private activities of Heads of State (Kimminich, in Archiv des Völkerrechts, vol. 26, Tubingen 1988, pp. 129 et seq., especially p. 160; Verdross and Simma, Universelles Völkerrecht, 3rd ed., Berlin 1984, pp. 640 et seq., paragraph 1027; Rousseau, Droit international public, vol. IV, Paris 1980, pp. 124-6).

(c) The privilege of the immunity from criminal jurisdiction of Heads of State, deduced from international custom, has not been fully codified in the Vienna Convention. Articles 31 et seq. of the Convention deal exclusively with the jurisdictional immunity of diplomatic agents who, pursuant to the interpretative rule contained in Article 1(e), are defined as heads of missions or members of the diplomatic staff of missions. But it cannot be concluded that the texts of the conventions drafted under the aegis of the United Nations grant a lesser protection to Heads of foreign States than to the diplomatic representatives of the States which those Heads of States lead or universally represent. The Convention on Special Missions, concluded in New York on 8 December 1969, ratified by Switzerland on 3 November 1977 and which entered into force for Switzerland on 21 June 1985, provides in Article 21, for example, that the Head of the sending State is one of the persons entitled to immunity from criminal jurisdiction in relation to the authorities of the receiving State (Article 31) when he is on an official visit. The Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of Crimes against Internationally Protected Persons, including Diplomatic Agents, signed in New York on 14 December 1973, defines "internationally protected person" as including any Head of State including any member of a collegiate body fulfilling, pursuant to the provisions of the Constitution of the State concerned, the functions of Head of State (Article 1(1)(a), first phrase; see the commentary to this provision in the Yearbook of the International Law Commission of the United Nations, 1972, vol. 2, pp. 339-40). In its report presented in 1986 to the Thirty-eighth Session of the General Assembly, devoted in part to the "Jurisdictional Immunities of States and their Property", the International Law Commission stressed, in its commentary to Article 4 of its draft on this problem, the scope of the privileges and immunities recognized by international law ratione personae to Heads of State, for which that draft article expressly makes a reservation (Yearbook of the International Law Commission, 1986, vol. 2, second part, pp. 7 et seq., especially pp. 15-16). Heads of State therefore enjoy absolute jurisdictional immunity in all foreign States for all acts which would ordinarily be subject to the jurisdiction of those States, whatever the connection in which those acts were committed. This privilege, granted for the benefit of foreign States to their highest dignitaries, is limited by both the willingness of that State [to accord it] and the duration of the functions of the Head of State. Articles 32 and 39 of the Vienna Convention must therefore apply by analogy to Heads of State. According to Article 32, the sending State may waive the immunity from jurisdiction of its agents, but it must always do so expressly. Acts evincing such an intention are therefore insufficient. Article 39 provides that, when the functions of a person enjoying privileges and immunities have come to an end, such privileges and immunities cease at the moment when he leaves the receiving State. However, immunity subsists with respect to those acts which he performed in the exercise of his functions as a member of the diplomatic mission (sub-Section 2). The conditions in which a Head of State abandoned his powers, and the fact that he has left the State over which he was ruling in order to live abroad in exile in the State which intends to prosecute him, are without importance (see, in this regard, Decaux, Le statut du chef d'Etat déchu in Annuaire français de droit international, vol. 26, 1980, pp. 101 et seq.), especially pp. 101-4 and 138-9; Fiedler, Das Staatsoberhaupt im Exil in Archiv des Völkerrechts 1988, vol. 26, pp. 181 et seq.).

(d) The immunity in relation to their functions which the appellants enjoyed therefore subsisted for those criminal acts which were allegedly committed while they were still exercising their powers in the Republic of the Philippines. The proceedings brought against them before the United States courts could therefore only be pursued pursuant to an express waiver by the State of the Philippines of the immunity which public international law grants them not as a personal advantage but for the benefit of the State over which they ruled (cf. Delbrück/Wolfrum, op. cit., p. 254). For this reason, the Federal Tribunal requested the Federal Office of Police on 7 July 1989 to ascertain whether the United States of America had received a declaration from the competent authorities in the Republic of the Philippines regarding waiver of the immunity of President and Mrs Marcos. In response to that enquiry by the requested authorities, the requesting State produced a note verbale written on 17 October 1988 by the Department of Foreign Affairs of the Republic of the Philippines to the Embassy of the United States of America in Manila, of which the following is an extract in translation:

> Taking note of this Treaty (on mutual assistance concluded between the two States), the Philippine Government hereby waives all immunity (1) of the State, (2) of the Head of State and (3) diplomatic immunity which the former Philippine President Ferdinand Marcos and his wife Imelda Marcos might enjoy or might have enjoyed on the basis of American law or international law, including but not exclusively immunity under Article 39(2) of the Vienna Convention, by virtue of the functions which those persons lately occupied in the Government of the Republic of the Philippines. This waiver covers the proceedings brought against Ferdinand and Imelda Marcos in the case mentioned above (enquiry conducted by the Public Prosecutor for the State of New York), as well as any criminal act or other connected matter in relation to which the persons in question might seek to invoke their immunity. This waiver does not, however, affect the Philippine Government itself or any former or present member of that Government.
> With regard to the possible application of the American doctrine of act of State, the Philippine Government wishes to stress that, from its standpoint, the acquisition of any personal wealth by President and Mrs Marcos cannot constitute public, governmental or official action by the Philippine Government, even if such enrichment was achieved by the use or the purported use of governmental authority. It follows that it would be contrary to the interests of the Philippines and the interests of justice for the persons in question to be able to benefit from the doctrine of act of State . . .

This declaration was transmitted to the agent of the appellants. In submissions made on 1 September 1989, the appellants argued that the waiver of immunity did not follow the proper procedure, that the act in question was at any rate contrary to the Philippine Constitution and to the principles of customary international law, that it did not mean that the Philippine authorities had waived their jurisdiction over the acts listed in the United States request for mutual assistance, and that the declaration of waiver of immunity had not been produced by the Government of the United States in the course of the proceedings currently pending before the District Court of the State of New York.

These objections are not relevant. From a substantive standpoint, the declaration contained in the diplomatic note of 17 October 1988 was made in response to the desire, expressed by the Federal Tribunal at its session on 28 June 1989, not to cooperate in a possible violation of the law of nations by the requesting State. From a formal standpoint, it is decisive that this declaration emanated from one of the governing organs of the Philippines, which the Federal Tribunal is entitled to consider as a qualified representative of that State. The question of whether the waiver at issue is in conformity with the procedural and substantive law of the Republic of the Philippines is a question of foreign law which it is not for the Federal Tribunal to resolve. The same consideration applies to the question of the scope which the American courts should give to the declaration in question. The proper place for such arguments to be developed by the parties is before the trial court before which, if appropriate, judgments rendered in the meantime can be invoked in this regard.

Switzerland, Federal Tribunal. 31 July 1990

SUMMARY: The facts:—The Permanent Mission of State X to the United Nations leased a villa in Geneva for which it had not paid rent since the beginning of 1989. In 1990 the lessor obtained an attachment order against a bank account held in the name of State X at a Swiss bank. The competent cantonal authority vacated the attachment on the ground that the funds affected were allocated exclusively for the performance of sovereign functions. The lessor lodged a public law appeal before the Federal Tribunal.

Held:—The appeal was dismissed.

(1) Assets allocated for the financing of a diplomatic mission of a foreign State enjoyed immunity from attachment. This included funds allocated to cover the payment of accommodation costs for the personnel of a permanent

Oxford Reports on International Law in Domestic Courts is edited by:

Professor André Nollkaemper, University of Amsterdam and August Reinisch, University of Vienna.

Facts

F1 Mr Peter Tatchell sought a warrant for the arrest of Robert Mugabe, President of Zimbabwe, on charges relating to torture allegedly ordered to be committed by him in Zimbabwe.

Held

H1 The application for an arrest warrant was refused.

H2 Although international law evolved over a period of time, in light of the judgment of the House of Lords in R v Bow Street Metropolitan Stipendiary Magistrate, ex p Pinochet Ugarte (No 3), (2000) 1 AC 147 and that of the International Court of Justice in Arrest Warrant of 11 April 2000, Congo, the Democratic Republic of the v Belgium, (2002) ICJ Rep 3, customary international law which was part of United Kingdom common law currently provided absolute immunity to any head of state. (paragraph 5)

Analysis

A1 Although it was very likely, it was not clear from the brief judgment whether the crime in respect of which the warrant was sought was that recognized in Section 134 (Torture) of the Criminal Justice Act, 1988, over which the United Kingdom asserted universal jurisdiction pursuant to the Convention Against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (10 December 1984) 1465 UNTS 85, entered into force 26 June 1987. In accordance with Section 135(a) of the Criminal Justice Act, proceedings for an offence under Section 134 shall not be begun in England and Wales except by, or with the consent of, the Attorney-General. But Section 25(2)(a) of the Prosecution of Offences Act, 1985 provided that the requirement of the Attorney-General's consent shall not prevent the issue of a warrant for the arrest of a person for any offence.

A2 The present decision—which did not emanate from a superior court of record and, as such, has no formal precedential value in the English courts—was the only one Judge Workman could have come to, given Section 20 of the State Immunity Act, which operated by reference to the Diplomatic Privileges Act, which in turn incorporated by way of schedule the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations (18 April 1961) 500 UNTS 95, entered into force 24 April 1964. By this tortuous route, English law recognized the inviolability from measures of constraint and the absolute immunity from criminal process of a foreign head of state. Moreover, in Pinochet Ugarte (No 3), most of the Lords stressed that a serving head of state continues to enjoy immunity from criminal process even in respect of torture within the meaning of the Convention Against Torture, a dictum consonant with the later decision of the French Court of Cassation (Chambre criminelle) in SOS Attentats et Béatrice Castelnau d'Esnault c Gaddafy, French Court of Cassation, 00-87.215, Arrt no 1414, 125 ILR 490, 508, 13 March 2001, the dicta of the ICJ in Arrest Warrant of 11 April 2000, and the ruling of the Belgian Court of Cassation in Abbas Hijazi v Sharon, Belgian Court of Cassation, 127 ILR; ILDC 5 (BE 2003), 12 February 2003.

Robert Mugabe

1 Mr Tatchell has most thoroughly and carefully prepared this application for a warrant for the arrest of Robert Mugabe on allegations of torture in Zimbabwe.

2 He has provided me with a wealth of information both factually and on issues of international law. I have read Mr Tatchell's submissions and the supporting documentation. I have also considered the case of Pinochet and the International Court of Justice ruling in The Democratic Republic of Congo v Belgium including the separate and dissenting opinions in that case.

3 The issue to which I have directed my mind is whether President Mugabe has immunity from prosecution as a Head of State, It is accepted that he is presently the Head of State of Zimbabwe.

4 Mr Tatchell has argued persuasively that the doctrine of State immunity is not one which sits comfortably with the State's obligation under international law to prosecute grave crimes of universal jurisdiction. Mr Tatchell has sought to persuade me that the principal [sic] of universal jurisdiction should be extended to override the immunity afforded to a Head of State.

5 Whilst international law evolves over a period of time international customary law which is embodied in our Common Law currently provides absolute immunity to any Head of State.

6 In addition to the Common Law our State Immunity Act of 1978 which extends the Diplomatic Privileges Act of 1964 provides for immunity from the criminal jurisdiction for any Head of State.

7 I am satisfied that Robert Mugabe is President and Head of State of Zimbabwe and is entitled whilst he is Head of State to that immunity. He is not liable to any form of arrest or detention and I am therefore unable to issue the warrant that has been applied for.

Editor's Summary

President Al Bashir of Sudan attended the African Union ("AU") Summit hosted by the RSA Government in June 2015. At the time there were warrants for his arrest issued by the International Criminal Court ("the ICC") in respect of war crimes, crimes against humanity, and genocide. The Statute of the International Criminal Court was adopted in Rome on 17 July 1998. The RSA is a State Party to the Rome Statute. As a State Party, the RSA was obliged to bring about the domestication of the provisions of the statute into RSA law. It did so by enacting the Implementation of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court Act 27 of 2002 ("the Implementation Act"). This obliges the government to co-operate with the ICC to effect the arrest of persons suspected of war crimes, genocide and crimes against humanity. The ICC had requested State Parties to the Statute including South Africa to arrest Bashir in the event that he entered their jurisdictions.

When Bashir was in the RSA on 14 and 15 June 2015 the Government failed to arrest him. The Southern Africa Litigation Centre, a human rights organisation, brought an urgent application aimed at requiring the RSA Government to arrest Bashir and surrender him to the ICC. The Government opposed the application, contending that Bashir, as a foreign head of state attending the AU summit, was immune from arrest. The Government relied on a hosting agreement that it had concluded with the AU which provided that the RSA would grant members and staff of the AU Commission, delegates, and representatives of intergovernmental organisations attending the meeting certain privileges and immunities. The Government also relied on the AU Convention which conferred immunity from arrest or detention on representatives of member states. This purported recognition of immunity was formalised by the adoption of a Cabinet minute and the publication of a Government Notice issued under section 5(3) of the Diplomatic Immunities and Privileges Act 37 of 2001. The Notice stated the terms of the hosting agreement.

On 14 June 2015 when the urgent application first came before the High Court an interim order was made prohibiting Bashir from leaving the RSA and ordering the Government to enforce that prohibition. The matter was postponed until the next day to give the Government an opportunity to file answering affidavits. However, Bashir left the RSA at about 11:30am on 15 June 2015 from Waterkloof Air Base while the matter was still being argued. At the commencement of the hearing, Counsel for the Government, upon being asked by the Court, gave an assurance that Bashir was still in the country. The Court made an order at about 1pm declaring that the conduct of the Respondents to the extent that they had failed to take steps to arrest and detain Bashir was inconsistent with the Constitution, and an order requiring Respondents forthwith to take all reasonable steps to prepare to arrest Bashir and detain him, pending a formal request from the International Criminal Court for his surrender. After this order was made Counsel for the Government informed the Court that Bashir had left the RSA earlier that day.

The High Court refused the Government leave to appeal against its order, considering that Bashir's departure had rendered the litigation moot. On petition to the Supreme Court of Appeal, the application for leave to appeal was set down for argument in terms of section 17(2)(d) of the Superior Courts Act 10 of 2013.

In the Supreme Court of Appeal the Government abandoned its earlier argument that the hosting agreement provided for certain immunities and privileges which prevented the Government from arresting Bashir "during the duration of the Summit and an additional two days after the conclusion of the Summit". Instead, the Government pointed to section 4(1)(a) of the Diplomatic Immunities and Privileges Act 37 of 2001 ("the DIPA") which provides that "a head of state is immune from the criminal and civil jurisdiction of the Courts of the Republic, and enjoys such privileges as heads of state enjoy in accordance with the rules of customary international law". The Government contended that the general immunity that a head of state enjoys under customary international law and section 4(1) of the DIPA qualified the obligation of the RSA, that would otherwise exist

as a State party to the Rome Statute, to arrest and surrender a head of state for whom the ICC had issued an arrest warrant in respect of the commission of international crimes.

A question therefore arose of the relationship between the Implementation Act and the head of state immunity conferred by customary international law and the DIPA.

A further issue was whether there was now an international crimes exception to the principle of head of state immunity, enabling a State or national court to disregard such immunity when called upon by the ICC to assist in implementing an arrest warrant. It was accepted that once a head of state had been brought before the ICC no plea of head of state immunity could be invoked. However, this did not necessarily mean that a State was entitled to ignore head of state immunity when requested to co-operate with the ICC to bring such a person before it. A question of an international crimes exception to head of state immunity arose in this context. In the absence of a binding treaty or other international instrument creating such an exception guidance had to be sought in the decisions of international courts. After a survey and consideration of such decisions, the majority found that it was unable to hold that at this stage of the development of customary international law there was an international crimes exception to the immunity and inviolability that heads of state enjoyed when visiting foreign countries and before foreign national courts.

The Court then turned to the question of whether the enactment of the Implementation Act altered the position.

Whether the Implementation Act had the effect of removing the immunity that Bashir would otherwise enjoy was a matter of the proper construction of the Implementation Act. The principles to be followed in that regard were settled, and were in the present case strongly influenced by the fact that the Implementation Act was a statute that incorporated an international agreement into South African law. The Court was required by section 233 of the Constitution to construe it in a manner consistent with international law. An interpretation of the Implementation Act that resulted in the RSA not complying with its obligations under the Rome Statute was to be avoided if possible. Furthermore, section 39(2) of the Constitution obliged the Court to interpret the Implementation Act in a way that promoted the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights. There were a number of provisions of the Bill of Rights that informed its spirit, purport and objects in this context.

Section 4(2) of the Implementation Act provides that "[d]espite any other law to the contrary, including customary and conventional international law, the fact that a person is or was a head of State or government . . . is neither a defence to a crime nor a ground for any possible reduction of sentence once a person has been convicted of a crime". This was relevant to the interpretational exercise. It was an indication that the RSA did not support immunities when people were charged with international crimes. Recognition of head of state immunity alongside the provisions of section 4(2) to preclude someone from being brought to trial in South Africa would create an anomaly. Under the Criminal Procedure Act an accused was brought to court either by arrest or indictment. Either procedure would compel the accused to submit to the criminal jurisdiction of a South African Court, which was inconsistent with immunity. Under section 4(3)(c) a South African Court had jurisdiction to try someone for an international crime if they were present in the territory of the RSA. In such a trial it would be no answer for the accused to raise immunity. But on the argument for the Government this would not matter because it would be impossible for the accused to be brought before the Court in terms of the Criminal Procedure Act. A construction of section 4(2) that would exclude claims of immunity if a person were being tried before a South African Court, but would not exclude immunity in seeking to bring that person to trial before that Court would be a serious anomaly.

The Court was driven to conclude that when the RSA decided to implement its obligations under the Rome Statute by passing the Implementation Act it did so on the basis that all forms of immunity, including head of state immunity, would not constitute a bar to the prosecution of international crimes in the RSA or to the RSA co-operating with the ICC by way of the arrest and surrender of persons charged with such crimes before the ICC, where an arrest warrant had been issued and a request for co-operation made.

The Court accepted that the relief granted by the High Court (having to deal with the matter as an urgent application) was not as well-formulated as more mature consideration would have permitted. An appropriate order to have made would have read: "The conduct of the Respondents in failing to take steps to arrest and detain, for surrender to the International Criminal Court, the President of Sudan, Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir, after his arrival in South Africa on 13 June 2015 to attend the 25th Assembly of the African Union, was inconsistent with South Africa's obligations in terms of the Rome Statute and section 10 of the Implementation of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court Act 27 of 2002, and unlawful."

Accordingly, the application for leave to appeal was granted and the order of the High Court was varied to read as set out in the preceding paragraph.

Ponnan JA (with Lewis JA concurring) produced a separate judgment concurring in this order.

Several entities had applied for admission as amici curiae. All but one of such applications were dismissed. The majority judgment dealt at some length with the process to be followed by a party desirous of admission as an amicus curiae, the requirements to be admitted as such, and the rights that such admission conferred. In particular, admission as an amicus does not automatically entitle the amicus to make oral submissions. Whether an amicus will be entitled to make oral submissions will be determined by the Court hearing the appeal. Only those parties which show that they have new contentions to advance will be considered for admission as amici. An amicus will not be permitted to traverse ground already covered by other parties, but will be confined to making submissions on the new contentions that it wishes to place before the Court. New contentions are those that may materially affect the outcome of the case. Prospective amici and their advisers must consider the nature and scope of the dispute between the parties and, on that basis, determine whether they have distinct submissions to make that may alter the outcome or persuade the Court to adopt a different line of reasoning in determining the outcome of the appeal.

Introduction

[1] The International Criminal Court ("ICC") was established by the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (the "Rome Statute") to exercise jurisdiction over the most serious crimes of concern to the international community as a whole. Article V identifies them as genocide, crimes against humanity and war crimes - collectively international crimes - and defines them in articles VI, VII and VIII respectively. Article V also foreshadows the crime of aggression, which remains to be defined. The Rome Statute affirms that these crimes must not go unpunished and that their effective prosecution must be ensured by taking measures at the national level and by enhancing international co-operation.1 In addition to the jurisdiction of national courts to prosecute these crimes the Rome Statute confers jurisdiction on the ICC to try such crimes and convict and sentence those who commit such crimes. It is a matter of pride to citizens of this country that South Africa was the first African state to sign the Rome Statute. It did this on 17 July 1998 and ratified it on 27 November 2000. It incorporated it into the domestic law of South Africa in terms of section 231(4) of the Constitution by enacting the Implementation of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court Act 27 of 2002 (the "Implementation Act"). The Rome Statute is annexed to the Implementation Act as a matter of information.

[2] Chapter 4 of the Implementation Act provides the mechanism whereby South Africa co-operates with the ICC in regard to the arrest and surrender of persons accused of international crimes. The failure by the applicants, to whom I will, in accordance with the terminology of their Counsel, refer collectively as the Government, to pursue those mechanisms to arrest the president of Sudan, Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir ("President Al Bashir"), when he was in Johannesburg on 14 and 15 June 2015 to attend the 25th ordinary session of the Assembly of the Africa Union ("AU"), gave rise to the present litigation.

[3] President Al Bashir is a controversial figure as a result of the actions of his government and their supporters, such as the Janjaweed Militia, principally in Darfur, but also elsewhere in Sudan. On 31 March 2005, the Security Council of the United Nations adopted Resolution 1593 (2005). It noted the report of the International Commission of Inquiry on violations of international humanitarian law and human rights law in Darfur, and decided to refer the situation in Darfur since 1 July 2002 to the Prosecutor of the ICC. As a result of the investigations by the ICC, President Al Bashir stands accused of serious international crimes. The Pre-Trial Chamber of the ICC has issued two warrants for his arrest. The first warrant was issued on 4 March 2009 and related to charges of war crimes and crimes against humanity. The second warrant was issued on 12 July 2010 and related to charges of genocide. The warrants have been forwarded to all countries that are parties to the Rome Statute, including South Africa, with a request that they co-operate under the Rome Statute and cause President Al Bashir to be arrested and surrendered to the ICC. Sudan is not a party to the Rome Statute.

[4] When President Al Bashir arrived in South Africa to attend the AU assembly in June 2015 the Government took no steps to arrest him. Indeed it adopted, and continues to adopt, the stance that it was obliged not to do so as President Al Bashir enjoyed immunity from such arrest. I will revert to the grounds for it taking this stance in due course. Its failure to do so resulted in the respondent, the South African Litigation Centre ("SALC"), bringing an urgent application on Sunday 14 June 2015, in the Gauteng Division of the High Court, Pretoria (to which I shall refer as the "High Court"), seeking orders declaring the failure to take steps to arrest President Al Bashir to be in breach of the Constitution and to compel the Government to cause President Al Bashir to be arrested and surrendered to the ICC to stand trial pursuant to the two warrants.

[5] The Government opposed the urgent application and sought and obtained a postponement until 11:30am on Monday, 15 June 2015 to enable affidavits to be prepared. But there was an obvious concern that President Al Bashir might leave the country in the interim in order to escape arrest. Accordingly, in granting the postponement, the High Court made the following order:

"1. President Omar Al Bashir of Sudan is prohibited from leaving the Republic of South Africa until a final order is made in this application, and the respondents are directed to take all necessary steps to prevent him from doing so;

2. The eighth respondent, the Director-General of Home Affairs is ordered:

2.1 to effect service of this order on the official in charge of each and every point of entry into, and exit from, the Republic; and

[6] At the hearing the following day before a specially constituted Full Court of three judges presided over by Judge President Mlambo, it stood down further because the affidavits were not yet ready. The hearing commenced at about 1pm and the Court sought the assurance from Counsel then leading for the Government, Mr W Mokhari SC, that President Al Bashir was still in the country. He informed the Court that according to his instructions President Al Bashir was still in the country and this was repeated during the course of the argument. At about 3pm, the Court made the following order:

"1. That the conduct of the Respondents to the extent that they have failed to take steps to arrest and/or detain the President of the Republic of Sudan Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir (President Bashir), is inconsistent with the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996, and invalid;

2. That the respondents are forthwith compelled to take all reasonable steps to prepare to arrest President Bashir without a warrant in terms of section 40(1)(k) of the Criminal Procedure Act 51 of 1977 and detain him, pending a formal request for his surrender from the International Criminal Court;

3. That the applicant is entitled to the cost of the application on a pro-bono basis."

[7] Immediately after this order was made, Counsel for the Government told the Court that President Al Bashir had left the country earlier that day. According to an affidavit later filed by the Director-General: Home Affairs, the eighth applicant, he appears to have left on a flight from Waterkloof Air Base at about 11:30 am that morning. The affidavit failed to explain how a head of state, using a military air base reserved for the use of dignitaries, could possibly have left the country unobserved. The Director-General said that President Al Bashir's passport was not among those shown to officials of his department, but as an explanation that is simply risible. Senior officials representing Government must have been aware of President Al Bashir's movements and his departure, the possibility of which had been mooted in the press. In those circumstances, the assurances that he was still in the country given to the Court at the commencement and during the course of argument were false. There seem to be only two possibilities. Either the representatives of Government set out to mislead the Court and misled Counsel in giving instructions, or the representatives and Counsel misled the Court. Whichever is the true explanation, a matter no doubt being investigated by the appropriate authorities, it was disgraceful conduct.

[8] Largely because of President Al Bashir's departure the High Court refused leave to appeal, saying that the litigation had become moot. On petition to this Court it ordered that the application for leave to appeal be set down for argument in terms of the provisions of section 17(2)(d) of the Superior Courts Act 10 of 2013. The President of this Court directed that it be set down as an urgent matter before the commencement of the Court's term. The parties were directed to deliver a full record and to be prepared to address full argument to us on the merits of the case. It is on that basis that the case is before us.

Litigation history

[9] The foundation for SALC's argument before the High Court was the obligations undertaken by South Africa in terms of the Rome Statute and the Implementation Act. It contended that, by virtue of these, South Africa was obliged to give effect to the request of the ICC to enforce the two warrants for President Al Bashir's arrest and surrender to the ICC for prosecution in respect of the charges of war crimes, genocide and crimes against humanity. Perhaps anticipating resistance by the Government, it annexed to its founding affidavit a judgment delivered by the Pre-Trial Chamber of the ICC on 13 June 2015 declaring that South Africa was obliged to arrest and surrender President Al Bashir.2

[10] The Government did not make any attempt to challenge these propositions. Instead, it founded its defence to the application on certain special arrangements that it had made with the AU for the holding of the Assembly in Johannesburg. These were explained in detail in affidavits by Ms Sindane, the second applicant and the Director-General of Justice and Constitutional Development, and Dr Lubisi, the Director-General of the Presidency and the Secretary of Cabinet.

[11] Ms Sindane said that after South Africa agreed to host the AU Summit in June 2015 it entered into an agreement (the "hosting agreement") with the Commission of the AU relating to the material and technical organisation of the various meetings that were to take place at the Summit including the 25th Assembly of the AU. Based on this agreement she said that President Al Bashir had been invited to attend by the AU and not by the South African Government. She then referred to article VIII of the hosting agreement, which was headed "Privileges and Immunities", and read:

"The Government shall afford the members of the Commission and Staff Members, delegates and other representatives of Inter-Governmental Organisations attending the Meetings the privileges and immunities set forth in Sections C and D, Article V and VI of the General Convention on the Privileges and Immunities of the OAU."

[12] On 5 June 2015, and pursuant to section 5(3) of the Diplomatic Immunities and Privileges Act 37 of 2001 ("DIPA"), the Minister of International Relations and Co-operation, the fifth applicant, published GN 470 in the *Government Gazette*3 recognising the hosting agreement for the purposes of granting the immunities and privileges as provided for in article VIII, which was annexed to the notice. Dr Lubisi testified that the matter was discussed at a Cabinet meeting where it was decided, after seeking the advice of the Chief State Law Adviser, that "the South African government as the hosting country is first and foremost obliged to uphold and protect the inviolability of President Bashir in accordance with the AU terms and conditions".[4] He added that "Cabinet collectively appreciated and acknowledged that the aforesaid decision can only apply for the duration of the AU Summit."

[13] On this basis, and this basis alone, Ms Sindane claimed that the immunities and privileges referred to in article VIII of the hosting agreement prevented the Government from arresting President Al Bashir "during the duration of the Summit and an additional two days after the conclusion of the Summit". The application was argued on this basis and the High Court quite correctly summarised the issue before it as being "whether a Cabinet resolution coupled with a Ministerial Notice are capable of suspending this country's duty to arrest a head of state against whom the International Criminal Court (ICC) has issued arrest warrants for war crimes, crimes against humanity and genocide".

[14] With the advent of new Counsel, led by Mr JJ Gauntlett SC, an entirely different argument emerged in the application for leave to appeal to this Court. It was now based upon what were said to be the provisions of customary international law and the provisions of section 4(1)(a) of DIPA, which reads:

> "(1) A head of state is immune from the criminal and civil jurisdiction of the Courts of the Republic, and enjoys such privileges as -
> (a) heads of state enjoy in accordance with the rules of customary international law . . . "

[15] The previous argument about the provisions of the hosting agreement and the ministerial notice under section 5(3) of DIPA was relegated to a backseat. Indeed, it was not pursued in that form. Instead, it was said that as the ministerial notice had not been set aside on application to a competent court it continued to be effective to confer immunity on President Al Bashir, even if misconceived.[5]

[16] This change of tack by the Government effectively challenged the foundation of SALC's claim that the Government was under an obligation, by virtue of its accession to the Rome Statute and the enactment of the Implementation Act, to arrest President Al Bashir and surrender him to the ICC. The Government contended that the general immunity that a head of state enjoys under customary international law and section 4(1) of DIPA qualified the obligation of South Africa, that would otherwise exist as a state party to the Rome Statute, to arrest and surrender a head of state for whom the ICC has issued an arrest warrant in respect of the commission of international crimes. The response by SALC was two pronged. It said that the provisions of sections 4(2) and 10(9) of the Implementation Act dealt specifically with these issues and affirmed the obligations of arrest and surrender assumed by South Africa under the Rome Statute. That alone would be decisive, as Mr Trengove SC emphasised in oral argument, but, if not, SALC joined issue with the Government on whether the rules of customary international law relied on by the Government in support of the claim to immunity afforded immunity to a head of state charged with international crimes before the ICC.

[17] Five parties applied to be admitted as amici curiae and permitted to present written and oral submissions to the Court. One, the Helen Suzman Foundation (the "Foundation"), was granted such leave in advance of the hearing. The applications by the other four[6] were not submitted timeously as required by rule 16 of the rules of this Court. Nor were they dealt with by the President or Acting President as contemplated by the same rule. As this created uncertainty, the presiding judge, in consultation with the remaining members of the Court, permitted them to deliver written argument and to make oral submissions at the hearing encompassing both whether they should be admitted as amici and the merits. An application by two of them, the African Centre for Justice and Peace Studies and the International Refugee Rights Initiative, to submit extensive evidence of what they alleged were atrocities still being committed by and at the behest of President Al Bashir, was however dismissed.[7] It is not and never has been a function of this litigation to determine whether the allegations made against President Al Bashir are well-founded and, even if admissible, evidence concerning his alleged conduct would not assist the Court to resolve the legal issues that confront it.

The issues

[18] The following issues fall to be determined:

(a) Did the departure of President Al Bashir render the issues moot?

(b) Should leave to appeal be granted?

(c) Should the four amici other than the Foundation, or any of them, be given leave to intervene as amici?

(d) Did article VIII of the hosting agreement, together with the ministerial proclamation, provide President Al Bashir with such immunity, at least for so long as the proclamation was not set aside?

(e) If not, was President Al Bashir entitled to immunity from arrest and surrender in terms of the arrest warrants issued by the ICC by virtue of customary international law and section 4(1) of DIPA?

(f) If President Al Bashir would ordinarily have been entitled to such immunity did the provisions of the Implementation Act remove that immunity?

(g) If not, have Security Council Resolution 1593 (2005) and the Genocide Convention (1948) removed his immunity?

(h) If the appeal does not succeed, should the order stand or should it be varied in certain respects?

(i) What orders should be made in respect of costs?

Is the appeal moot?

[19] The High Court based its refusal of leave to appeal on section 16(2)(a)(i) of the Superior Courts Act 10 of 2013 (the "Superior Courts Act"), which provides that when at the hearing of an appeal the issues are of such a nature that the decision sought will have no practical effect or result, the court may dismiss the appeal on that ground alone. The High Court reasoned that because President Al Bashir had left the country the case no longer presented a live controversy. It cited Janse van Rensburg NO v

Page 497 of 2016 (4) BCLR 487 (SCA)

Minister of Trade and Industry and another NNO[8] in support of that proposition. But that case and others like it[9] dealt with situations where the legislation, the constitutional validity of which was the subject of the litigation, had been repealed or replaced by different legislation. That is very different from the present case. Here a declaration had been made that the Government's conduct breached the Constitution and the legislation in point is very much in force. The central issue is what effect it has on the important question whether South Africa is obliged to arrest and surrender to the ICC the head of state of a foreign nation, who has been charged with international crimes before the ICC.

[20] It is correct that no present effect can be given to the order that the Government take steps to prepare to arrest President Al Bashir, because he is not in South Africa. But the order remains in existence and SALC indicated that any attempt by President Al Bashir to return to this country would prompt it to seek its enforcement. As such the order had a continuing effect that would have to be taken into account by the Government in the future conduct of its diplomatic relations. This was well illustrated by certain newspaper reports that were annexed to the opposing affidavit in the application for leave to appeal. These indicated that the South African government had wanted to invite President Al Bashir to a Forum on China-Africa Co-operation to be held in this country in December 2015, but in view of the High Court's decision had suggested to Sudan that it send someone else to represent it. Any invitation to host future gatherings of AU heads of state, for example, would have to bear the judgment of the High Court in mind and could preclude this country from extending such an invitation.

[21] In those circumstances, the High Court erred in holding that there had ceased to be a live and justiciable controversy between the parties.

Leave to appeal

[22] Apart from its finding that the appeal had become moot the High Court also referred to section 17(1)(a)(i) of the Superior Courts Act and held that an appeal had no reasonable prospect of success. But in reaching that conclusion it did not consider the new basis upon which the Government sought to justify its opposition to SALC's claim. So we do not have the benefit of the High Court's view in regard to those contentions.

[23] After expressing its conclusion on prospects of success the High Court also said that it had no discretion once it reached that conclusion to grant

leave to appeal. But it failed to consider the provisions of section 17(1)(a)(ii) of the Superior Courts Act which provide that leave to appeal may be granted, notwithstanding the Court's view of the prospects of success, where there are nonetheless compelling reasons why an appeal should be heard. This is linked to the question of mootness. In that regard there is established jurisprudence in this Court that holds that even where an appeal has become moot the Court has a discretion to hear and dispose of it on its merits. The usual ground for exercising that discretion in favour of dealing with it on the merits is that the case raises a discrete issue of public importance that will have an effect on future matters.[10] That jurisprudence should have been considered as a guide to whether, notwithstanding the High Court's view of an appeal's prospects of success, leave to appeal should have been granted. In my view, it clearly pointed in favour of leave to appeal being granted.

[24] That is not to say that merely because the High Court determines an issue of public importance it must grant leave to appeal. The merits of the appeal remain vitally important and will often be decisive. Furthermore, where the purpose of the appeal is to raise fresh arguments that have not been canvassed before the High Court, consideration must be given to whether the interests of justice favour the grant of leave to appeal. It has frequently been said by the Constitutional Court that it is undesirable for it as the highest court of appeal in South Africa to be asked to decide legal issues as a court of both first and last instance. That is equally true of this Court. But there is another consideration. It is that if a point of law emerges from the undisputed facts before the court it is undesirable that the case be determined without considering that point of law. The reason is that it may lead to the case being decided on the basis of a legal error on the part of one of the parties in failing to identify and raise the point at an appropriate earlier stage.[11] But the court must be satisfied that the point truly emerges on the papers, that the facts relevant to the legal point have been fully canvassed and that no prejudice will be occasioned to the other parties by permitting the point to be raised and argued.[12]

[25] In the present case SALC accepted that the fresh argument advanced by the Government was foreshadowed by the factual material before the Court. No prejudice would be caused by permitting it to be raised at this stage. It is undoubtedly a point of substantial public importance. The new arguments cannot be said to lack reasonable prospects of success and they were forcefully and cogently argued before us. In those circumstances, leave to appeal should be granted.

Amici

[26] Applications for admission as amici curiae in this Court have hitherto been dealt with ad hoc and the provisions of the rule governing such applications have not yet been the subject of detailed consideration in a judgment. It is as well therefore to deal shortly with this topic. Such applications are made in terms of rule 16 of the rules of this Court.[13] In terms of rule 16(1) if all parties agree to the admission of an amicus they are admitted as such.[14] The rule contemplates that the parties when agreeing to the admission of an amicus will agree on the terms on which the amicus is to be admitted. Under rule 16(2) those are then the terms that govern their admission, subject to the power of the President of the Court to amend or vary those terms under rule 16(3). It is apparent that the terms can relate only to the delivery of written argument, which is limited to 20 pages, because rule 16(8) provides that no amicus has a right to address oral submissions to the Court unless the Court so orders. Given the wording of the rule it is plain that this is a reference to the Court hearing the appeal and not the President when dealing with an application for admission as an amicus. The general experience of the members of this Court is that the President leaves the question of oral argument to the presiding judge or Court hearing the appeal. Accordingly, leave to make oral submissions can only be sought after the written submissions have been delivered and the Court has the opportunity of considering whether hearing oral submissions from the amicus will assist in its deliberations. If an amicus seeks leave to make oral submissions it must set out the grounds therefor in its written argument.

[27] Adherence to this procedure will ensure that the written argument of the amicus can be considered along with the reading of the record and the consideration of the heads of argument of the parties when the members of the Court are engaged in preparing the appeal. It is only then that it will be possible to determine whether the amicus can add anything by way of oral submissions. But the Court will nonetheless consider its argument. Whether it will permit the amicus to make oral submissions will depend upon its assessment of whether those submissions can add anything to an argument already before it in written form.

[28] Where there is no agreement among the parties as to the admission of an amicus it is entitled to seek its admission by way of an application to the President of the Court in terms of rule 16(4). The basis upon which such an application shall be made is set out in rules 16(5) and (6). The rule does not make provision for any opposition to such an application, but the general practice is for the President to invite a response from other parties who oppose the admission. The President then determines the application in accordance with rule 16 and, if the amicus is admitted, determine the terms upon which they are admitted and permitted to deliver written

argument. The rule's constraints on the length of written argument apply unless relaxed by the President.[15]

[29] An amicus is not entitled to submit further evidence to the Court but is confined to the record. That is expressly provided in rule 16(8). It is unnecessary to consider whether there are exceptional circumstances in which the Court hearing the appeal may relax that rule.[16] In making submissions the amicus is not permitted to traverse ground already covered by other parties, but is confined to making submissions on the new contentions that it wishes to place before the Court.[17] In that regard it is apposite to point out that adding additional references, whether to case law or to academic writings, on the matters canvassed in the heads of argument of the litigants, does not amount to advancing new contentions. That obviously does not exclude placing material before the Court to demonstrate that a point of controversy between the parties has been settled by way of an authoritative judgment. It would only be if there had, for example, been an authoritative decision placing a legal issue thought to be controversial beyond dispute that an amicus may include that in its argument. Otherwise it is confined to its new and different contentions and these must be clearly stated.

[30] Finally, new contentions are those that may materially affect the outcome of the case. It is not feasible to be prescriptive in this regard but prospective amici and their advisers must start by considering the nature and scope of the dispute between the parties and, on that basis, determine whether they have distinct submissions to make that may alter the outcome or persuade the Court to adopt a different line of reasoning in determining the outcome of the appeal. Obvious examples would be urging the Court to adopt reasoning based on provisions of the Constitution in construing a statute, where the parties have not taken that course, or a submission that the fundamental legal principles to be applied in determining the dispute are other than those submitted by the parties where their adoption would materially affect the outcome of the case. No doubt others can be imagined.[18]

[31] It is appropriate to comment that the applications appear to have paid little heed to the language of rule 16. In the first place other than that of the Foundation, none of the letters addressed to the Government and

SALC sought to define with any clarity the new contentions that the prospective amici wanted to raise or why they would be of assistance to the Court. The complaints concerning this by the Government in its responses to the requests were in my view generally well-founded.

[32] An even clearer difficulty is that, again with the exception of the Foundation, the letters did not spell out the terms on which the prospective amici sought admission as such. Nor in every case did the response from SALC. It merely indicated its willingness to agree to admit the amici without dealing with the terms upon which they should be admitted. When applications were brought they overlooked the fact that an application to the President of the Court is an application for admission as an amicus, but not an application to be permitted to make oral submissions. It is the Court hearing the appeal that makes that decision. If an amicus wishes to make oral submissions it should indicate that when it submits its written submissions.

[33] The Deputy President of this Court granted the Foundation leave to intervene as an amicus prior to the hearing. While there was some procedural confusion about that order and the Government indicated that it would have opposed it had it been afforded the opportunity to do so,19 it was in my judgment an order that was properly made. The Foundation's approach to the dispute was wholly distinct from that of SALC. The latter approached the case on the basis of its view of the content of customary international law and an interpretation of the relevant provisions of the Implementation Act and DIPA. The Foundation's starting point was the constitutional provisions that make international law part of South African law and from that foundation developed submissions as to the proper construction of section 4(1) of DIPA and its relationship to the obligations undertaken by this country under the Rome Statute and the Implementation Act. These contentions were clearly new and of assistance to the Court in dealing with the merits of the appeal.

[34] Notwithstanding the refusal of their application to submit further evidence to the Court, the African Centre for Justice and Peace Studies and the International Refugee Rights Initiative submitted heads of argument in support of the dismissal of the appeal and Counsel appeared on their behalf. It was unclear from their application that in addition to the further evidence they had any new contentions to advance, because they said that the legal arguments would be addressed by SALC "and there is no need for the applicants to address it any further". The stated purpose of their intervention was to place "vital evidence" before the Court in order "to make it plain to the Court that the only real hope of justice for the victims of Sudan is for President Al-Bashir and the members of his government who have been indicted by the ICC to be arrested and surrendered to the ICC by a third state". Nonetheless on 8 February 2016, four days before the hearing they delivered heads of argument and a bundle of authorities running to some 750 pages.

[35] The purpose of this, according to the heads of argument and as explained by Counsel, was to stress that, in the absence of a remedy before the ICC, victims of international crimes perpetrated by President Al Bashir and persons for whose actions he might be held responsible, would have no effective remedy. But that added nothing to the resolution of the issues before us. The principle of complementarity that underpins the Rome Statute20 makes it clear that the ICC exists to provide a forum for prosecution of international crimes where national courts are unable or unwilling to do so. So, it is apparent that where victims are unable to proceed in their own national court the ICC will necessarily be the tribunal to which they will turn for justice and protection,21 as well as reparations for crimes of which they have been the victims.22

[36] Not only were the matters that these parties sought to raise apparent to the Court from the terms of the Rome Statute itself, but no indication was given of how knowledge of them would affect the determination of the issues in the case. Those involved the construction of a South African statute, DIPA, and the question whether it afforded President Al Bashir

immunity against arrest under the Implementation Act pursuant to the warrants issued by the ICC. For those reasons, the application for admission as amici curiae by the African Centre for Justice and Peace Studies and the International Refugee Rights Initiative must be refused. In view of the valuable work that these organisations perform in their field of activities, and their genuine concern in regard to the issues raised in this case and the background facts giving rise to the ICC's decision to charge President Al Bashir with international crimes, it would be inappropriate to order them to pay any costs incurred by other parties arising out of their application.

[37] Then there is the application by the Peace and Justice Initiative and the Centre for Human Rights. Again there is no doubting their legitimate concerns about events in Sudan and the continuing inability of the ICC to bring President Al Bashir to trial in respect of the charges he faces of having committed international crimes. But legitimate concern over issues providing the background to an appeal is not of itself a justification for admission as an amicus curiae. The prospective amicus must either have the agreement of the other parties, which was not forthcoming in this case, or must satisfy the President of the Court that it is entitled to be so admitted in terms of rule 16.

[38] These two bodies sought to advance argument on five matters set out in their heads of argument. These heads were accompanied by a bundle of documents amounting to a little short of 1000 pages delivered on 8 February 2016. The contentions advanced in the heads of argument differed somewhat from the matters described in their application, but the differences did not appear to be significant. The five matters were the international nature of the crimes and the ICC; the import of Security Council Resolution 1593 (2005); the effect of Sudan and South Africa being a signatory to the Genocide Convention (1948);23 the interpretation of articles 27 and 98 of the Rome Statute, especially in the light of the travaux préparatoires and "the original intent of the drafters"; and the unavailability of fora akin to the ICC with international jurisdiction, in Africa or elsewhere, to prosecute the alleged perpetrators in this case.

[39] The last of these overlapped with the contentions by the African Centre for Justice and Peace Studies and the International Refugee Rights Initiative and does not provide a ground for the admission of these parties as amici. Proof of the content of the travaux préparatoires and "the original intent of the drafters" would require evidence, which is impermissible and leave to lead which was neither sought nor granted. As regards the other three matters they were all dealt with in the arguments of the Government and SALC. They were not new contentions. For those reasons the application for their admission as amici curiae must be refused, but again and for similar reasons no adverse order for costs should follow.

Article VIII of the hosting agreement

[40] This was not only the principal, but also the only, argument advanced by Government before the High Court. It assumed secondary importance when the application for leave to appeal was brought. It was pursued in this Court principally on the footing that until the ministerial proclamation was set aside it afforded President Al Bashir immunity from arrest and surrender under the Implementation Act. I deal with it first in order to stress that, contrary to the Government's criticism, the High Court's understanding of the issue argued before it was undoubtedly correct and to affirm the correctness of its conclusions on that issue.

[41] The High Court gave the argument short shrift. It said that on its terms the hosting agreement conferred immunity on members or staff of the AU Commission and on delegates and other representatives of Inter-Governmental Organisations. This did not include member states or their representatives or delegates. Furthermore the section of DIPA relied on by the Minister in making her proclamation was section 5(3). That section empowered the Minister to confer immunity on:

> "Any organisation recognised by the Minister for the purposes of this section and any official of such organisation enjoy such privileges and immunities as may be provided for in any agreement entered into with such organisation or as may be conferred on them by virtue of section 7(2)."

Plainly, so the High Court held, the section did not cover heads of state or representatives of states attending meetings of the AU, but only the AU itself and other organisations such as the Inter-Governmental Organisations referred to in article VIII. The definition of an organisation in section 1 of DIPA demonstrates that it does not apply to member states but to intergovernmental organisations.

[42] There is little that can be added to that reasoning. I mention the following. Section 5 has the heading "Immunities and privileges of United Nations, specialised agencies and other international organisations". That fortifies the conclusion that a proclamation under the section does not apply to other persons. Second, the hosting agreement is one between South Africa as the host nation and the AU. It is intended to deal with the representatives and officials of the AU and organisations with which it has relationships, not with the position of heads of state and state delegations. If there is to be a special agreement for immunity in respect of such persons it must be made under section 7. Otherwise their right to immunity, if any, will arise by virtue of customary international law and, in South Africa, DIPA. Although section 4(1)(c) of DIPA contemplates the possibility of a section 7 agreement applying to a head of state a careful reading suggests that this relates only to the conferral of additional privileges that the head of state would not otherwise enjoy by virtue of section 4(1)(a).

[43] Counsel for the Government endeavoured to circumvent these difficulties in the following way. Prior to President Al Bashir coming to South Africa

Sudan had requested that he be afforded the privileges and immunities of a delegate attending the AU Summit. The provisions of article VIII of the hosting agreement were promulgated for this purpose. Even if the Minister exceeded her powers in doing so the proclamation remained in force until set aside in terms of the Oudekraal principle.[24] As it had not been set aside it remained effective to confer immunity on President Al Bashir notwithstanding any underlying legal defects in its proclamation.

[44] The difficulty with this contention is that it demands in the first instance that article VIII of the hosting agreement covered President Al Bashir. If it did not it was irrelevant that the Minister thought, or had been advised, that it did. And that in turn depended in the first instance upon President Al Bashir being a delegate to the AU Assembly. But a head of state attending an AU Assembly does not do so as a delegate but as the embodiment of the member state itself. That is apparent from the AU's description of the Assembly on its website as:

> "The Assembly is the African Union's (AU's) supreme organ and comprises Heads of State and Government from all Member States."

[45] The Constitutive Act of the AU makes this perfectly clear. In article 1 it defines "Member State" as being "a Member State of the Union" and the "Assembly" as "the Assembly of Heads of State and Government of the Union". The "Union" is the AU. In terms of article 6.1 it is composed of Heads of State and Government "or their duly accredited representatives". Under article 7.1 decisions of the Assembly are taken by consensus, or failing that by a two-thirds majority of Member States. The AU is composed of member states and the Assembly is its governing body composed of the heads of state or heads of government of the member states. They are the embodiment of the member states not delegates from them. Without the heads of state and heads of government or their representatives there can be no Assembly.

[46] Over and above that difficulty there is no basis for saying that heads of state attending the Assembly were encompassed by the reference to "delegates" in article VIII.1 of the hosting agreement. The agreement was concluded between the AU and the South African government. There is nothing to indicate that the AU was representing the heads of state of member states or their delegations in concluding the agreement or was concerned with their entitlement to immunity when visiting South Africa. That was a matter for the diplomatic relationship between South Africa and other member states, not the AU. It is an agreement relating to the "material and technical organisation" of various meetings including the Assembly. It makes no reference to heads of state in any of its provisions. The key words in article VIII.1 are "the delegates and other representatives of Inter-Governmental Organizations attending the Meetings". That relates only to persons who are there because of their entitlement to be

there on behalf of one or other inter-governmental organisation, not to those who are there on behalf of a member state.25

[47] The necessary conclusion is that President Al Bashir was not a person included in the reference to "delegates" in article VIII.1 of the hosting agreement. As such the hosting agreement did not confer any immunity on President Al Bashir and its proclamation by the Minister of International Relations and Co-operation did not serve to confer any immunity on him. The fact that the Cabinet may have thought that it would is neither here nor there. An erroneous belief cannot transform an absence of immunity into immunity. And, that being so, it was unnecessary for SALC to seek to set the proclamation aside before bringing its application.

[48] The High Court was accordingly correct in the conclusion it reached on the arguments placed before it. It cannot be criticised for not dealing with an argument that was never raised or suggested before it. It was proper therefore for it to make an order in favour of SALC on the issues before it. Whether its order was correct in the light of the new arguments now raised is the matter to which I now turn.

Was there immunity under customary international law and section 4(1) of DIPA?

[49] The argument on behalf of Government ran as follows. It is a well established principle of customary international law that heads of state enjoy immunity ratione personae, that is, by virtue of the office they hold, and are not subject to the criminal or civil jurisdiction of the Courts of other countries or any other form of restraint. In the usual terminology they are regarded as inviolable. This immunity is embodied in section 4(1)(a) of DIPA, which provides:

"A head of state is immune from the criminal and civil jurisdiction of the Courts of the Republic, and enjoys such privileges as -

(a) heads of state enjoy in accordance with the rules of customary international law . . . "

It follows that before the enactment of the Implementation Act President Al Bashir would have enjoyed immunity from arrest and surrender to the ICC notwithstanding South Africa's accession to the Rome Statute.

[50] The Government submitted that the Implementation Act does not remove this immunity. On a proper construction of section 4(2) of the Implementation Act it has nothing to do with immunity from arrest in terms of the ICC warrants, but precludes immunity being advanced as a defence or in mitigation of sentence in a prosecution for international crimes before a South African Court. It does not therefore remove the immunity that a head of state enjoys from arrest in South Africa even for international crimes to be prosecuted before the ICC. As to section 10(9) of the Implementation Act it is concerned only with the surrender of a person properly arrested pursuant to an ICC warrant. It precludes such a person from raising immunity to preclude surrender. But it is silent on the question whether such person may be arrested in the first place. If they were immune from arrest then they should not be arrested and there is no room for an inquiry in terms of section 10(5) of the Implementation Act and therefore no room for applying the exclusion of immunity in section 10(9).

[51] SALC countered this argument in the following way. The Implementation Act was intended to give effect to South Africa's accession to the Rome Statute and South Africa's obligations thereunder. These included the obligation to co-operate with the ICC in causing persons in respect of whom the ICC has issued arrest warrants and requested assistance to be arrested and surrendered. Properly construed, in the light of these obligations, the provisions of sections 4(2) and 10(9) of the Implementation Act preclude anyone, whether in a prosecution before a South African Court, or when arrested pursuant to an ICC warrant, from raising as defence to their prosecution or ground for resisting their arrest and surrender, any form of immunity.

[52] In the alternative, SALC joined issue with the Government on the contents of customary international law. It contended that whatever the position may be in relation to a national court, in the case of an international tribunal, such as the ICC, set up to deal with international crimes, there is no immunity from arrest or prosecution. In regard to the specific situation in Sudan SALC contended that the effect of Security Council Resolution 1593 (2005) was to subject Sudan to the provisions of the Rome Statute, notwithstanding the fact that it has not acceded to it and thereby to compel it to cooperate with the ICC. A consequence of that, and the fact that Sudan was obliged to co-operate fully with the ICC, was that it could not invoke immunity to prevent President Al Bashir from being arrested and surrendered to face trial before the ICC. In regard to the second arrest warrant, which dealt with the crime of genocide, SALC pointed out that Sudan was a party to the Genocide Convention (1948) and as such it contended that it had waived any immunity that its citizens would otherwise have enjoyed for prosecution of crimes falling within the scope of the Convention.

[53] The Foundation's argument took the Constitution as its starting point. It said that under the Constitution the

Government is required to take steps to ensure that persons accused of international crimes are detained, arrested and prosecuted before an appropriate tribunal. This duty is reinforced by the fact that under section 232, customary international law is law in South Africa unless it is inconsistent with the Constitution or an Act of Parliament.[26] Section 231 deals with the legal effect of international agreements, such as the Rome Statute, to which South Africa is a party. Under section 231(4) an international agreement becomes law in South Africa when it is enacted into law by national legislation. So customary international law is to be read in the light of legislation under which South Africa has enacted international agreements into law. When construing section 4(1)(a) of DIPA and its reference to customary international law, it must be read in the light of these constitutional obligations and provisions. The immunity confirmed in section 4(1)(a) of DIPA must therefore be construed in a way that is consistent with the absence of immunity from prosecution for international crimes provided in the Rome Statute.

The Rome Statute

[54] The Rome Statute is an international agreement between the State Parties thereto, directed at the prosecution and sentencing of those responsible for the international crimes of war crimes, genocide and crimes against humanity. The importance of the international struggle to rid the world of these crimes is resoundingly stated in the Preamble in the following terms:

"The States Parties to this Statute,

Conscious that all peoples are united by common bonds, their cultures pieced together in a shared heritage, and concerned that this delicate mosaic may be shattered at any time,

Mindful that during this century millions of children, women and men have been victims of unimaginable atrocities that deeply shock the conscience of humanity,

Recognizing that such grave crimes threaten the peace, security and well-being of the world,

Affirming that the most serious crimes of concern to the international community as a whole must not go unpunished and that their effective prosecution must be ensured by taking measures at the national level and by enhancing international co-operation,

Determined to put an end to impunity for the perpetrators of these crimes and thus to contribute to the prevention of such crimes,

Recalling that it is the duty of every State to exercise its criminal jurisdiction over those responsible for international crimes,

Determined to these ends and for the sake of present and future generations, to establish an independent permanent International Criminal Court in relationship with the United Nations system, with jurisdiction over the most serious crimes of concern to the international community as a whole,

Emphasizing that the International Criminal Court established under this Statute shall be complementary to national criminal jurisdictions,

Resolved to guarantee lasting respect for and the enforcement of international justice,

Have agreed as follows".

[55] Article 1 creates the ICC and gives it the power "to exercise its jurisdiction over persons for the most serious crimes of international concern". Although the Rome Statute was concluded outside the United Nations ("UN") the aim under article 2 is to bring it into relationship with the UN by agreement between the UN and the ICC. The international crimes that are the subject of the ICC's jurisdiction are defined, as is the Court's jurisdiction. In the ordinary course the ICC has jurisdiction over state parties and their nationals and where a non-party state accepts the jurisdiction of the Court.

[56] This jurisdiction is not universal because parties may for various reasons not accede to the Rome Statute.[27] Article 13(b) of the Rome Statute endeavours to address this problem by providing that the ICC may exercise jurisdiction if:

"a situation in which one or more of such crimes appears to have been committed is referred to the Prosecutor by the Security Council acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations."

The Security Council referred the situation in Darfur to the Prosecutor in terms of this provision. While there is debate among commentators as to the full effect of such a referral, it is accepted by all that it confers jurisdiction upon the ICC in respect of the actions of a non-party state and its citizens.[28] UN member states are obliged to accept the authority of the decision by the Security Council to refer the situation in Darfur to the Prosecutor.[29]

[57] Part 9 of the Rome Statute deals comprehensively with the obligations of international co-operation and judicial assistance to the ICC in the performance of its tasks. Article 86 imposes a general obligation to co-operate fully with the Court in the investigation and prosecution of crimes within its jurisdiction. Under article 87.1(a) the ICC may address requests for co-operation to States Parties and under article 88 all States Parties are obliged to have procedures available under national law to enable them to co-operate with the Court.

[58] Article 89 deals with the arrest and surrender of persons to the ICC and its entitlement to request a State to co-operate in securing such arrest and surrender. It is common cause that the ICC has made such a request to South Africa in relation to the arrest warrants issued in respect of President Al Bashir. In urgent cases the ICC may, in terms of article 92, seek the provisional arrest of a person, but that was not the case here, although there appears to have been some confusion over the issue in the application papers and the order made by the High Court. I will revert to that later.

[59] Article 27 of the Rome Statute deals with the possibility that the crime being prosecuted is likely in many instances to have been perpetrated by a state actor, ranging from a head of state to a humble official or soldier, and therefore the possibility would exist of the accused person raising a claim to immunity in accordance with long-established principles of customary international law, to be considered later in this judgment. It reads:

> "1. This Statute shall apply equally to all persons without any distinction based on official capacity. In particular, official capacity as a Head of State or Government, a member of a Government or parliament, an elected representative or a government official shall in no case exempt a person from criminal responsibility under this Statute, nor shall it, in and of itself, constitute a ground for reduction of sentence.
> 2. Immunities or special procedural rules which may attach to the official capacity of a person, whether under national or international law, shall not bar the Court from exercising its jurisdiction over such a person."

The undisputed effect of this provision is that it is not open to a person being prosecuted before the ICC to claim immunity from prosecution or advance a defence of superior orders. It is agreed by all commentators that, because Party States have bound themselves to the Statute including this provision, all Party States have waived any immunity that their nationals would otherwise have enjoyed under customary international law.

[60] One further provision requires discussion. It is article 98 providing that:

> "1. The Court may not proceed with a request for surrender or assistance which would require the requested State to act inconsistently with its obligations under international law with respect to the State or diplomatic immunity of a person or property of a third State, unless the Court can first obtain the co-operation of that third State for the waiver of the immunity.
> 2. The Court may not proceed with a request for surrender which would require the requested State to act inconsistently with its obligations under international agreements pursuant to which the consent of a sending State is required to surrender a person of that State to the Court, unless the Court can first obtain the co-operation of the sending State for the giving of consent for the surrender."

This provision has occasioned much debate. There is a measure of consensus that it deals with requests for surrender or assistance in relation to the nationals, including heads of state, of non-Party States such as Sudan. Beyond that there appear to be two views. The one, espoused by the AU,[30] is that it operates to protect Party States from the obligation to cooperate with requests from the ICC for arrest and surrender or assistance where that would involve their breaching their obligations to respect personal inviolability under customary international law towards non-Party

States.[31] In other words, it provides the justification for African states to refuse to arrest and surrender President Al Bashir, because he is entitled as the head of state of Sudan to immunity ratione personae.[32] The other view is that, as non-Party States and their nationals are ordinarily brought within the jurisdiction of the ICC by way of a Security Council reference under article 13(b), article 27 is thereby made applicable to the non-Party State and therefore it is not open to it to rely on article 98.[33] It is well-recognised that there is a tension between articles 27 and 98 that has not as yet been authoritatively resolved.

[61] South Africa is bound by its obligations under the Rome Statute. It is obliged to co-operate with the ICC and to arrest and surrender to the Court persons in respect of whom the ICC has issued an arrest warrant and a request for assistance. To this end, it passed the Implementation Act. The relationship between that Act and the head of state immunity conferred by customary international law and DIPA lies at the heart of this case. But the starting point is not immediately with these, but with the Constitution.

The constitutional background

[62] The Constitution makes international customary law part of the law of South Africa, but it may be amended by legislation.[34] It provides a specific mechanism whereby obligations assumed under international agreements become a part of the law of South Africa.[35] And it decrees that, when interpreting any legislation, the Courts must prefer a reasonable interpretation that is consistent with international law over any alternative interpretation that is inconsistent with international law.[36] As Ngcobo CJ said in Glenister (II):[37]

> "Our Constitution reveals a clear determination to ensure that the Constitution and South African law are interpreted to comply with international law, in particular international human-rights law . . . These provisions of our Constitution demonstrate that international law has a special place in our law which is carefully defined by the Constitution."

[63] The Constitution incorporated these provisions pursuant to the goal stated in the Preamble that its purpose is to "[b]uild a united and democratic South Africa able to take its rightful place as a sovereign state in the family of nations". From being an international pariah South Africa has sought in our democratic state to play a full role as an accepted member of the international community. As part of this aim it enacted the Implementation Act, the preamble to which records that South Africa has become "an integral and accepted member of the community of nations".

[64] The Constitutional Court explained the inter-relationship between South Africa's obligations under international law and its domestic law in National Commissioner of Police v Southern African Human Rights Litigation Centre.[38] The Court was dealing with claims of torture, but its statements also referred to international crimes and are apposite in the context of the present case. Giving the judgment of the Court Majiedt AJ said:

> "[37] Along with torture, the international crimes of piracy, slave-trading, war crimes, crimes against humanity, genocide and apartheid require states, even in the absence of binding international-treaty law, to suppress such conduct because 'all states have an interest as they violate values that constitute the foundation of the world public order'. Torture, whether on the scale of crimes against humanity or not, is a crime in South Africa in terms of s 232 of the Constitution because the customary international law prohibition against torture has the status of a peremptory norm.
> [38] Furthermore, along with genocide and war crimes there is an international treaty law obligation to prosecute torture. The Convention against Torture, an international convention drafted specifically to deal with the crime of torture, obliges states parties to 'ensure that all acts of torture are offences under its criminal law', together with an 'attempt to commit torture' and 'complicity and participation in torture'.
>
> [39] South Africa has fulfilled this international-law obligation through the recent enactment of the Torture Act [Prevention and Combating of Torture of Persons Act 13 of 2013]. In effect, torture is criminalised in South Africa under s 232 of the Constitution and the Torture Act whilst torture on the scale of crimes against humanity is criminalised under s 232 of the Constitution, the Torture Act and the ICC Act . . .
> [40] Because of the international nature of the crime of torture, South Africa, in terms of ss 231(4), 232 and 233 of the Constitution and various international, regional and subregional instruments, is required, where appropriate, to exercise universal jurisdiction in relation to these crimes as they offend against the human conscience and our international-and domestic-law obligations. The exercise of universal jurisdiction is, however, subject to certain limitations."

[65] That passage strongly supports SALC's case that the Government was under an obligation to co-operate with the ICC in arresting President Al Bashir. I did not understand Mr Gauntlett SC to challenge it as a general proposition. His contention was that, as foreshadowed in the final sentence, the principles governing the immunity ratione personae of heads of state constituted a limitation on this exercise of universal jurisdiction that precluded the performance of these obligations in relation to current heads of state.[39] This necessitates a consideration of the nature of immunity in customary international law and, more specifically, the nature of head of state immunity.

Immunity in customary international law

[66] Professor Crawford[40] describes the basic principles of the international law of immunity in the following terms:

> "State immunity is a rule of international law that facilitates the performance of public functions of the state and its representatives by preventing them from being sued or prosecuted in foreign Courts. Essentially, it precludes the Courts of the forum state from exercising adjudicative and enforcement jurisdiction in certain classes of case in which a foreign state is a party. It is a procedural bar (not a substantive defence) based on the status and functions of the state or official in question. Previously described as a privilege conferred at the behest of the executive, the grant of immunity is now understood as an obligation under customary international law . . . [T]he existence of this obligation is supported by ample authority . . . Immunity exists as a rule of international law, but its application depends substantially on the law and procedural rules of the forum."

This immunity is available when it is sought to implead a foreign state, whether directly or indirectly,[41] before domestic Courts, and also when action is taken against state officials acting in their capacity as such. They enjoy the same immunity as the state they represent.[42] This is known as immunity ratione materiae (immunity attaching to official acts). In addition, heads of state and certain other high officials of state[43] enjoy immunity ratione personae (immunity by virtue of status or an office held at any particular time). This form of immunity terminates when the individual demits, or is removed from, office. The country concerned may waive either form of immunity.

[67] The Government called these principles in aid in support of its position that President Al Bashir was immune from arrest and surrender in terms of the Implementation Act. It cited the authoritative statements by the International Court of Justice ("ICJ") in the Arrest Warrant case[44] that:

> ". . . [I]n international law it is firmly established that . . . certain holders of High-ranking office in a State, such as the Head of State . . . enjoy immunities from jurisdiction in other States, both civil and criminal.

. . . [T]hroughout the duration of his or her office, he or she when abroad enjoys full immunity from criminal jurisdiction and inviolability. That immunity and inviolability protect the individual concerned against any act of authority of another State which would hinder him or her in the performance of his or her duties."

In regard to a suggestion that, because the case concerned allegations of the commission of international crimes, there was an exception to the principle, the ICJ said (paragraph 58) that it had examined State practice, including national legislation and decisions of higher national courts, but was unable to deduce that there existed under customary international law any exception to this rule where the individual concerned was suspected of having committed war crimes or crimes against humanity. This appears to be accepted by leading commentators such as Professor Akande.[45] It has also been widely accepted by national courts which have rejected attempts to implead sitting heads of state including Prime Minister Sharon of Israel, President Gaddafi of Libya, President Mugabe of Zimbabwe, Prime Minister Thatcher of the United Kingdom, President Castro of Cuba, President Zemin of China, President Kagame of Rwanda and President Aristide of Haiti, while the latter was living in exile in the United States of America.[46]

[68] Dating back to the instrument that established the Nuremberg Trials, it has been a feature of international instruments dealing with the prosecution of international crimes before specially constituted international tribunals, that those tribunals are constituted on the basis of specific provisions excluding claims of immunity as a defence or mitigating circumstance before those tribunals.[47] The ICJ considered these as well (paragraph 58) and found that they likewise did not enable it to conclude that any such exception existed in customary international law in regard to national Courts. But it was urged upon us that customary international law has moved on and at least when it was concerned with international crimes and international tribunals such as the ICC these principles were subject to an exception.

[69] I mean no disrespect to the efforts of Counsel to provide us with a comprehensive body of authority dealing with the issue of immunity in relation to persons charged with international crimes, in not engaging in a comprehensive consideration of the material placed before us. The narrow issue is whether there is now an international crimes exception to the principle of head of state immunity, enabling a state or national court to disregard such immunity when called upon by the ICC to assist in implementing an arrest warrant. The argument proceeded, as does this judgment, on the basis that once a head of state has been brought before the ICC no plea of head of state immunity can be invoked.[48] But, as a number of commentators have pointed out, that does not necessarily mean that a state is entitled to ignore head of state immunity when requested to co-operate with the ICC to bring such a person before it. It is in this context that the question of an international crimes exception to head of state immunity arises.

[70] In the absence of a binding treaty or other international instrument creating such an exception, or an established universal practice in the affairs of nations, one looks to the decisions of international courts for guidance as to the existence of such an exception. But we were referred to no decision by the ICJ itself, qualifying or limiting the scope of its decision in the Arrest Warrant case. Instead, the ICJ appears to have affirmed the decision in its subsequent judgment in Djibouti v France,[49] where it cited the judgment and explained that "the determining feature in assessing whether there has been an attack on the immunity of the Head of State lies in the subjection of the latter to a constraining act of authority". Then in the Jurisdictional Immunities case,[50] after a comprehensive review of both national and international jurisprudence on the point, the ICJ rejected a contention that international law does not recognise immunity, or at least restricts it, in cases involving serious violations of the law of armed conflict. No more recent case from the ICJ was drawn to our attention.

[71] The Jurisdictional Immunities case involved a civil claim by one state against another state, but I can discern nothing in the underlying treatment of customary international law that would justify admitting an exception to head of state immunity for international crimes in the context of criminal proceedings, but denying it in relation to civil proceedings. I am mindful that in some of the reasoning in both Pinochet (3)[51] and Jones[52]

there are passages in which a careful distinction is drawn between civil liability, and the case of criminal liability.[53] But Pinochet (3) was dealing with the criminal liability of a former head of state, not civil liability, and in Jones the House of Lords was concerned with the possible circumvention of state immunity, by permitting personal actions against the officials of the state. Permitting such an action would indirectly infringe the absolute immunity of the foreign state, but indirect infringement does not arise in a criminal case. Of greater relevance in regard to the contention that there is an international crimes exception to head of state immunity is that there are clear statements in Pinochet (3) that if Senator Pinochet had still been the Chilean head of state he would have enjoyed immunity ratione personae.[54] Apart from the point of circumvention of state immunity, it was not suggested that the principles of immunity are different in respect of criminal prosecution of international crimes as opposed to the adjudication of civil claims arising from the perpetration of international crimes. As pointed out by Professor Crawford the immunity afforded to state officials has always been the same as that of the state they represent.[55] And Dame Hazel Fox QC and Philippa Webb say that "Civil immunity can in the last resort . . . be regarded as based on criminal immunity."[56]

[72] In two cases, both relied on by the ICJ in the Jurisdictional Immunities decision, the European Court of Human Rights ("ECHR") has likewise accepted that customary international law is as stated in the Arrest Warrant case insofar as it concerns civil claims. The ICJ cited the following passage from the ECHR decision in Al Adsani:[57]

"Notwithstanding the special character of the prohibition of torture in international law, the Court is unable to discern in the international instruments, judicial authorities or other materials before it any firm basis for concluding that, as a matter of international law, a State no longer enjoys immunity from civil suit in the Courts of another State where acts of torture are alleged."

Then in Kalogeropoulou[58] the EHCR said:

"The Court does not find it established, however, that there is yet acceptance in international law of the proposition that States are not entitled to immunity in respect of civil claims for damages brought against them in another State for crimes against humanity."

[73] I can see the force of an argument that the prosecution of perpetrators of international crimes is of greater importance than permitting civil claims arising from their conduct. On the other hand, however, and having regard to the fact that customary international law is derived from the actions of states in their relations with one another, it may be that states would be more willing to accept immunity being withdrawn or attenuated

in relation to claims that sound in monetary terms, than they would to agree to permit their high-ranking office holders and officials to be prosecuted in other national courts. But as I have said no authority to which we were referred drew any distinction between the two situations or suggested that an international crimes exception was accepted in either situation. Professor O'Keefe argues persuasively that there is little likelihood of the acceptance of such an exception in the foreseeable future.[59]

[74] It may be that these considerations will inform future debate and contribute to the development of customary international law, but our task is to assess the state of customary international law as it stands at the present time and apply it. That is what the Constitution requires us to do. While in other areas of the law the Court's function includes the development of the law, in the area of customary international law its task is one of discerning the existing state of the law, not developing it. As Lord Hoffmann said in Jones:[60]

"It is not for a national Court to 'develop' international law by unilaterally adopting a version of that law which, however desirable, forward-looking and reflective of values it may be, is simply not accepted by other states."

Development of customary international law occurs in international courts and tribunals, in the contents of international agreements and treaties and by its general acceptance by the international community of nations in their relations with one another as to the laws that govern that community. However tempting it may be to a domestic court to seek to expand the boundaries of customary international law by domestic judicial decision, it is not in my view permissible for it to do so.

[75] The ICC itself has affirmed that the Arrest Warrant case correctly reflects customary international law in respect of the immunity ratione personae of heads of state. In the DRC case concerning President Al Bashir[61] it said:

"At the outset, the Chamber wishes to make it clear that it is not disputed that under international law a sitting Head of State enjoys personal immunities from criminal jurisdiction and inviolability before national Courts of foreign States even when suspected of having committed one or more of the crimes that fall within the jurisdiction of the Court."

In support of this statement the ICC cited the Arrest Warrant case.

[76] The Arrest Warrant case specifically recognised that there are exceptions to this immunity. The decision mentioned four.[62] The first three were that there is no immunity before a domestic Court; no immunity if it is waived by the State they represent; and no immunity after they demit, or are removed from, office. The fourth bears upon the present case. The ICJ recognised that an incumbent of an office entitled to immunity ratione personae "may be subject to criminal proceedings before certain international criminal Courts, where they have jurisdiction". It mentioned various possible examples of which the ICC was one. The tribunals in question were those the founding statutes of which excluded such immunity as a defence or ground for moderating sentence. Does this provide the exception for which SALC contends? It has the support of at least one of the commentators cited by SALC.[63] But another equally eminent commentator cited by the Government disagrees.[64] No one so far as I can see claims that the matter has been clearly resolved as a matter of customary international law.

[77] There is a difference between saying that an international tribunal, having jurisdiction and constituted on terms that specifically exclude reliance on any principles of immunity, provides an exception to the customary international law rule that heads of state enjoy immunity ratione personae, and saying that a national court asked to provide assistance to that international tribunal is likewise not bound by the customary international law rule. It is the latter proposition with which we are concerned. And it is of great importance that in two instances in dealing with the arrest and surrender of President Al Bashir, the ICC did not found its decisions on that proposition. Instead it held that President Al Bashir does not enjoy any such immunity, because the Security Council removed it by way of Resolution 1593 (2005).

[78] Sudan is not a party to the Rome Statute. It has not therefore undertaken any obligations in relation to the ICC. By contrast a state that is a party to the Rome Statute is bound by its terms. As those include, in article 27, an express provision precluding reliance on immunity it is accepted that party states waive any rights to immunity that their own citizens might otherwise have enjoyed. But the position is different in respect of non-parties. Here the starting point must be that in terms of article 34 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties[65] a treaty such as the Rome Statute cannot impose obligations on states that are not parties to the treaty and have not consented to the imposition of such obligations.

[79] The ICC recognised this difficulty in the DRC case. It also accepted that in the ordinary course the only means of avoiding the difficulty was by invoking article 98 of the Rome Statute, which provides for the ICC to secure the co-operation of the third party state (in this case, Sudan) in waiving immunity and giving consent for the surrender of the person concerned. The papers do not reveal whether the ICC has made approaches to Sudan to secure a waiver or consent, but given that President Al Bashir is the head of state in that country it is obvious at a practical level that it would not be forthcoming.

[80] In DRC, the ICC held that requiring the DRC to arrest and surrender President Al Bashir did not create an inconsistency between its obligations under the Rome Statute and its international obligation to respect the immunities of President Al Bashir as a head of state. But its reasoning was not based on the existence of an international crimes exception to head of state immunity. It was based entirely on Security Council Resolution 1593 (2005). The ICC reasoned as follows:[66]

"The Chamber does not consider that such inconsistency arises in this case. This is so because by issuing Resolution 1593(2005) the SC[Security Council] decided that the 'Government of Sudan [. . . ] shall cooperate fully with and provide necessary assistance to the Court and the Prosecutor pursuant to this resolution'. Since Immunities attached to Omar Al Bashir are a procedural bar from prosecution before the Court, the co-operation envisaged in said resolution was meant to eliminate any impediment to the proceedings before the Court, including the lifting of immunities. Any other interpretation would render the SC decision requiring that Sudan 'co-operate fully' and 'provide any necessary assistance to the Court' senseless. Accordingly, the 'cooperation of that third party State [Sudan] for the waiver of the immunity' as required under the last sentence of article 98(1) of the Statute, was already ensured by the language used in paragraph 2 of the SC Resolution 1593(2005). By virtue of said paragraph, the SC implicitly waived the immunities granted to Omar Al Bashir under international law and attached to his position as a Head of State." (My emphasis added in italics. Underlined words emphasised in the original.)

[81] In its decision in relation to President Al Bashir's visit to South Africa referred to earlier[67] the ICC repeated this justification for its view that South Africa was not barred by President Al Bashir's status as a head of state from arresting him and causing him to be surrendered to the ICC. It said:[68]

"In conclusion, the Republic of South Africa is already aware of its obligation under the Rome Statute to immediately arrest Omar Al Bashir and surrender him to the Court, as it is aware of the Court's explicit position . . . that the immunities granted to Omar Al Bashir under international law and attached to his position as a Head of State have been implicitly waived by the Security Council of the United Nations by resolution 1593(2005) . . . "(My emphasis.)

[82] These decisions involved a departure by the ICC from its earlier decision holding that there is an international crimes exception to head of state

immunity when a person is charged with international crimes under the Rome Statute.[69] In Malawi[70] the ICC concluded that:

". . . [T]he Chamber finds that customary international law creates an exception to Head of State immunity when international Courts seek a Head of State's arrest for the commission of international crimes."

By contrast on the same question Professor Crawford[71] (since 2015 a judge of the ICJ) wrote, in respect of the ICC, that state parties had consented to the waiver of immunity in respect of their nationals by virtue of their agreement to article 27, but:

"The entitlement of nationals of non-parties to personal immunity is not obviously eroded, particularly in the light of Article 98(1) of the ICC statute."

He noted that the Pre-Trial Chamber held a firm opinion to the contrary, but that was written before the Chamber gave a different justification for its views in regard to President Al Bashir and immunity. Its current position appears to accept that President Al Bashir would enjoy head of state immunity, were it not, so it believes, for the fact that it has been waived by the Security Council.

[83] It would serve little purpose to trawl through the academic literature on the question as the commentators are divided, although one senses a desire on the part of many of them that the problem should be resolved by recognising an exception to the rule of head of state immunity. Were it simply a matter for me to determine I would be inclined to share the view expressed by Dr Weatherall[72] that:

". . . [T]he State is not an abstract entity but a community of human beings. Protection of international criminals . . . from international scrutiny under the guise of State dignity is an affront to the citizens against whom grave violations of human rights are perpetrated. As State sovereignty is increasingly viewed to be contingent upon respect for certain values common to the international community, it is perhaps unsurprising that bare sovereignty is no longer sufficient to absolutely shield High officials from prosecution for jus cogens violations,"

as well as that of the US District Court[73] he quotes:

"These precedents instruct that resort to head-of-state and diplomatic immunity as a shield for private abuses of the sovereign's office is wearing thinner in the eyes of the world and waning in the cover of the law. The prevailing trend teaches that the day does come to pass when those who violate their public trust are called upon, in this world, to render account for the wrongs they inflict on innocents."

[84] But the content of customary international law is not for me to determine and, like Dr Weatherall, I must conclude with regret that it would go too far to say that there is no longer any sovereign immunity for jus cogens (immutable norm) violations. Consideration of the cases and the literature goes no further than showing that Professor Dugard is correct when he says that "customary international law is in a state of flux in respect of immunity, both criminal and civil, for acts of violation of norms of jus cogens".[74] In those circumstances, I am unable to hold that at this stage of the development of customary international law there is an international crimes exception to the immunity and inviolability that heads of state enjoy when visiting foreign countries and before foreign national Courts.

[85] Ordinarily that would mean that President Al Bashir was entitled to inviolability while in South Africa last June. But SALC argued that the position was different as a result of the enactment of the Implementation Act. I turn to consider that contention.

The Implementation Act

[86] Whether the Implementation Act has the effect of removing the immunity that President Al Bashir would otherwise enjoy is a matter of the proper construction of the Implementation Act. The principles to be followed in that regard are settled.[75] In the present case they are strongly influenced by the fact that we are dealing with a statute that incorporated an international agreement into South African law and are required by section 233 of the Constitution to construe it in a manner consistent with international law. As international law requires state parties to international agreements to comply with the obligations they have assumed under those agreements, an interpretation of the Implementation Act that results in South Africa not complying with its obligations under the Rome Statute is to be avoided if possible.

[87] We are also obliged by section 39(2) of the Constitution to interpret the Implementation Act in a way that promotes the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights. There are a number of provisions of the Bill of Rights that inform its spirit, purport and objects in this context. If international crimes were committed in South Africa they would infringe a number of rights guaranteed under the Bill of Rights. Section 11 guarantees the right to life and we are here concerned with an arrest warrant that charges the crime of genocide. The charges of war crimes and crimes against humanity not only infringe that right but they also infringe the right to dignity in section 10 and the right to freedom and security of the person in section 12. Section 12(1) explains that this includes the right not to be deprived of freedom arbitrarily or without just cause; the right not to be detained without trial; the right to be free from all forms of violence from either public or private sources; the right not to be tortured and the right not to be treated in a cruel, inhuman or degrading way. Section 13 guarantees that no one may be subjected to slavery, servitude or forced labour and section 14 protects the right to privacy. Then there are the rights to freedom of religion, belief and opinion; freedom of expression and the right to assembly, demonstration and petition.

[88] Reference to the two arrest warrants show that the conduct of which President Al Bashir stands accused, and for which he is said to be responsible, involves acts that would infringe all of these rights. It is of course not for us to form or express a view on whether the conduct charged occurred or, if it did, his responsibility for it. But I mention it because it illustrates the importance in the context of the interpretation of the Implementation Act of construing it in a way that accords with and gives effect to the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights.

[89] The starting point in the interpretational exercise is the long title of the Implementation Act, which describes its purposes. It reads that it is an Act:

> "To provide for a framework to ensure the effective implementation of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court in South Africa; to ensure that South Africa conforms with its obligations set out in the Statute; to provide for the crime of genocide, crimes against humanity and war crimes; to provide for the prosecution in South African Courts of persons accused of having committed the said crimes in South Africa and beyond the borders of South Africa in certain circumstances; to provide for the arrest of persons accused of having committed the said crimes and their surrender to the said Court in certain circumstances; to provide for co-operation by South Africa with the said Court; and to provide for matters connected therewith."

[90] Some of these features warrant stressing in the light of the fact that there is no dispute that President Al Bashir is subject to the jurisdiction of the ICC and can be prosecuted by it for his alleged crimes. He has been stripped of any immunity when before the ICC. It is therefore important that the purpose of the Implementation Act is to provide a framework to ensure the effective implementation of the Rome Statute. It is to ensure that South Africa conforms to its obligations under the Rome Statute. In that regard there is no doubting its obligation to endeavour to bring President Al Bashir before the ICC for trial. The head of state immunity claimed for him is only a procedural bar to the enforcement of that obligation in this country.[76] It is not an immunity that confers impunity for any wrongdoing on his part.

[91] Lastly, the Implementation Act provides for the arrest of persons accused of international crimes and their surrender to the ICC and for co-operation between this country and the ICC. Those are powerful objectives. The reason for them appears from the preamble where the point is made that

"millions of children, women and men have suffered as a result of atrocities which constitute the crimes of genocide, crimes against humanity, war crimes and the crime of aggression in terms of international law". As a result of this and South Africa's own painful past the Republic of South Africa is committed to:

"* bringing persons who commit such atrocities to justice, either in a Court of law of the Republic in terms of its domestic laws where possible, pursuant to its international obligations to do so when the Republic became party to the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, or in the event of the national prosecuting authority of the Republic declining or being unable to do so, in line with the principle of complementarity as contemplated in the Statute, in the International Criminal Court, created by and functioning in terms of the said Statute; and

* carrying out its other obligations in terms of the said Statute".

[92] The relevant provisions of the Implementation Act must be read and construed in the light of this commitment, which as the Constitutional Court has pointed out, is constitutionally mandated. The first is section 4(2) which provides:

"(2) Despite any other law to the contrary, including customary and conventional international law, the fact that a person -

(a) is or was a head of State or government, a member of a government or parliament, an elected representative or a government official; or

(b) being a member of a security service or armed force, was under a legal obligation to obey a manifestly unlawful order of a government or superior, is neither -

(i) a defence to a crime; nor

(ii) a ground for any possible reduction of sentence once a person has been convicted of a crime."

[93] In Dugard,[77] it is suggested that this section is an endeavour by the Legislature to "cut past" the controversial issue of immunity ratione personae. I confess to being unpersuaded. The section is in a part of the Implementation Act conferring jurisdiction on South African Courts to try international crimes in certain circumstances. It would have been absurd and non-compliant with its international obligations for South Africa in such a case to permit the accused to raise immunity either ratione personae or ratione materiae, or obedience to orders, to avoid conviction or reduce any sentence. In the circumstances, the section paraphrased the provisions of article 27(1) of the Rome Statute and made them applicable in trials for international crimes in South Africa or, as Professor Du Plessis expressed matters, it "trumps" the immunities that would otherwise attach to individuals.[78] The difficulty lies in taking it further to create in South Africa an international crimes exception to head of state immunity. Nevertheless, that does not mean that it is irrelevant to the interpretational exercise. It is a clear indication that South Africa does not support immunities when people are charged with international crimes.

[94] Recognition of head of state immunity alongside the provisions of sec-tion 4(2) to preclude someone from being brought to trial in South Africa would create an anomaly. Under section 4(3)(c) a South African Court has jurisdiction to try someone for an international crime if they are present in the territory of the Republic. In such a trial it would be no answer for the accused to raise immunity either ratione personae or ratione materiae. But on the argument for the Government this would not matter because it would be impossible for the accused to be brought before the Court in terms of the Criminal Procedure Act 51 of 1977 ("CPA"). Under the CPA an accused is brought to Court either by arrest or indictment,[79] but either procedure would compel the accused to submit to the criminal jurisdiction of a South African Court, which is inconsistent with immunity.

[95] A construction of section 4(2) that would exclude claims of immunity if a person was being tried before a South African Court, but would not exclude immunity in seeking to bring that person to trial before that Court would in my view be a serious anomaly. The ordinary principle of interpretation is that the conferral of a power conveys with it all ancillary powers necessary to achieve the purpose of that power.[80] The purpose of the power to prosecute international crimes in South Africa is to ensure that the perpetrators of such crimes do not go unpunished. In order to achieve that purpose it is necessary for the National Director of Public Prosecutions to have the power not only to prosecute perpetrators before our Courts, but, to that end, to bring them before our Courts. This is also consistent with the constitutional requirement that the Implementation Act be construed in a way that gives effect to South Africa's international law obligations and the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights. The construction proffered on behalf of the Government emasculates the section in relation to international crimes that were perpetrated outside the borders of this country by nationals of other states. That is a construction that would defeat the purposes of the Implementation Act. It is not in my view correct.

[96] I turn then to the provisions of the Implementation Act dealing with requests for assistance from the ICC and, more particularly, requests for assistance in terms of arrest warrants issued by the ICC for the purpose of securing the presence before the Court of alleged perpetrators of international crimes. These are in sections 8 to 10 of the Act. Section 8(1) provides that when a request is received from the ICC for the arrest and surrender of a person for whom it has issued a warrant of arrest it must be referred to the Central Authority. This is defined as the Director-General: Justice and Constitutional Development, the present incumbent of which office is Ms Sindane. The Central Authority must immediately on receipt of the request forward the documents to a magistrate who must endorse the warrant for execution in any part of the Republic.[81] That was what occurred in relation to the request in relation to the first arrest warrant. It was forwarded to the Chief Magistrate, Pretoria, who endorsed it for execution.[82] So far as the record goes that warrant is still extant and operative.

[97] Section 9(3) provides that any warrant endorsed under section 8 must be in the form and executed in a manner as near as possible to that which is prescribed under the laws relating to criminal procedure in South Africa. This is the only part of section 9 that bears upon the two warrants in this case. The balance of the section deals with provisional warrants to be sought pursuant to a request by the ICC in terms of article 92 of the Rome Statute. That is irrelevant for the purposes of this case, save that in formulating its claim in the founding affidavit SALC sought to rely on section 9(1) and (2). This misconception appears to some degree to have coloured the relief sought by SALC. It will be dealt with below.

[98] Section 10 deals with the procedures to be followed before a competent court after arrest for the purposes of surrender. Within 48 hours of the person's arrest they must be brought before the magistrate in whose area of jurisdiction the arrest took place. The magistrate then conducts an inquiry in order to establish whether the warrant applies to the person in question; whether the person has been arrested in accordance with the procedures laid down in domestic law; and whether the person's rights as contemplated in the Bill of Rights have been respected, if, and to the extent which, they are or may be applicable.[83] The inquiry is conducted in the same manner as a preparatory examination under the CPA.[84] If, at the end of the inquiry, the magistrate is satisfied of the three matters specified in subsection (1) and that the person may be surrendered to the ICC,[85] then they "must order that such person be surrendered to the Court and that he or she be committed to prison pending such surrender.'[86] There is no scope for the exercise of any discretion in that regard. Provided the requirements for surrender are satisfied then the magistrate must order surrender.

[99] These provisions do not mention the issue of immunity. Nor is it apparent where a claim to immunity could find its place in the inquiry contemplated by section 10(1). The inquiry is expressly confined to the three matters specified and none of those appear to involve issues of immunity. Certainly the question whether the person arrested is the person referred to in the warrant does not raise that as an issue. Similarly, whether the person's arrest complied procedurally with the requirements for a valid arrest in South African domestic law would not raise that issue. When this difficulty was raised with Counsel he suggested that the inquiry became relevant when considering whether the arrested person's rights in terms of the Bill of Rights had been respected and referred to section 12 of the Constitution guaranteeing the right to freedom and security of the person and section 21 governing freedom of movement. But, if the Implementation Act provides for a person's arrest in those circumstances neither of those rights is infringed, or, if they are, the limitation is justified under section 36 of the Constitution. The argument is dependent on the premise that such an arrest would be unlawful because of the existence of immunity. But that begs the very question in issue in this case, namely, whether in relation to an ICC arrest warrant and request for assistance, such immunity exists.

[100] It is here that section 10(9) assumes crucial importance because it deals with the very question of the relevance of claims to immunity to the order of surrender. It provides that:

The persons referred to in section 4(2) include a person who "is or was a head of State". In other words, it includes any person in the situation of President Al Bashir. So the fact that President Al Bashir was such a person would not have provided a ground for a magistrate not to make an order for his surrender in terms of section 10(5).

[101] In an endeavour to circumvent what appears to be a plain provision the Government argued that section 10 deals only with the surrender of persons who had already been arrested under section 9 and that the latter section was silent on the question of immunity. But that creates an absurdity. If it were correct, then any person entitled on any basis to claim immunity would challenge their arrest by way of an interdict de libero homine exhibendo (the equivalent of a habeas corpus application in other jurisdictions) and demand their release. So the only people who could be brought before a magistrate under section 10 would be those who had no grounds for claiming immunity. But then section 10(9) would serve no purpose at all. It would be entirely redundant, because there would be no possible situation in which a person brought before the magistrate under section 10(1) would be a person referred to in section 4(2)(a) or (b). Needless to say such an interpretation is to be avoided.

[102] Counsel contended that to construe the Implementation Act in the manner suggested by SALC involved a tacit repeal or amendment of section 4(2) of DIPA, because that was the prior statute and until the Implementation Act was passed would have served to afford President Al Bashir immunity. He submitted that this is not lightly to be inferred.[87] That is no doubt correct, but there is another principle that emerges from the cases on this point. It was referred to by Marshall J in Gorham v Luckett:[88]

". . . if this last Act professes, or manifestly intends, to regulate the whole subject to which it relates, it necessarily supersedes and repeals all former acts, so far as it differs from them in its prescriptions."

This aptly describes the situation with which we are concerned. DIPA is a general statute dealing with the subject of immunities and privileges enjoyed by various people, including heads of state. The Implementation Act is a specific Act dealing with South Africa's implementation of the Rome Statute. In that special area the Implementation Act must enjoy priority. I would not, however, use the language of repeal or amendment. It is rather more an example of the application of the related principle in the converse situation embodied in the maxim generalia specialibus non derogant (general words and rules do not derogate from special ones).[89] Where there is legislation dealing generally with a topic and, either before or after the enactment of that legislation, the Legislature enacts other legislation dealing with a specific area otherwise covered by the general legislation, the two statutes co-exist alongside one another, each dealing with its own subject matter and without conflict. In both instances, the general statute's reach is limited by the existence of the specific legislation. So DIPA continues to govern the question of head of state immunity, but the Implementation Act excludes such immunity in relation to international crimes and the obligations of South Africa to the ICC.

[103] I conclude therefore that when South Africa decided to implement its obligations under the Rome Statute by passing the Implementation Act it did so on the basis that all forms of immunity, including head of state immunity, would not constitute a bar to the prosecution of international crimes in this country or to South Africa co-operating with the ICC by way of the arrest and surrender of persons charged with such crimes before the ICC, where an arrest warrant had been issued and a request for co-operation made.[90] I accept, in the light of the earlier discussion of head of state immunity, that in doing so South Africa was taking a step that many other nations have not yet taken. If that puts this country in the vanguard of attempts to prevent international crimes and, when they occur, cause the perpetrators to be prosecuted, that seems to me a matter for national pride rather than concern. It is wholly consistent with our commitment to human rights both at a national and an international level. And it does not undermine customary international law, which as a country we are entitled to depart from by statute as stated in section 232 of the Constitution. What is commendable is that it is a departure in a progressive direction.

[104] It is also important to note that this conclusion accords with the understanding of Government as to its obligations under and in terms of the Rome Statute and the Implementation Act. As noted above when South Africa received the first arrest warrant and request for assistance from the ICC, the Central Authority acted in terms of section 8(1) of the Implementation Act and forwarded it to the Chief Magistrate, Pretoria, who endorsed it for execution in any part of the Republic. When President Zuma was inaugurated and an invitation was extended to President Al Bashir to attend the inauguration, Sudan enquired whether he would be liable to arrest if he attended, and the answer was in the affirmative. The then Director-General of the Department of International Relations and Co-operation issued a public statement quoted in the papers, that:

There are several statements in the papers and the literature with which we have been furnished that indicate that there have been other occasions, such as the funeral of the late President Mandela, that President Al Bashir did not attend, because he would have been liable to arrest and surrender to the ICC had he done so. It is plain from this that, save for the circumstances of the present case, South Africa has hitherto complied meticulously with its obligations under the Rome Statute in respect of President Al Bashir.

[105] That brings me back to the point made in paragraphs 11 to 16 and 24 of this judgment that the arguments with which we have been confronted were not those on which the case was conducted in the Court below. Nor, and this is the important point, did they reflect the approach of the Government to the issues. That emerges from the affidavits of Ms Sindane and, in particular, of Dr Lubisi. Ms Sindane explained that the Government's reasons for not seeking to arrest President Al Bashir were based on the terms of the hosting agreement and the ministerial proclamation. And Dr Lubisi explained that "Cabinet collectively appreciated and acknowledged that the aforesaid decision can only apply for the duration of the AU Summit". These statements demonstrated that as far as South Africa was concerned this involved a departure from its commitment to its obligations under the Rome Statute. We have not been apprised of the reasons for South Africa departing from those obligations on this occasion. But, be that as it may, whilst the departure from this country's obligations was unfortunate, according to the affidavits it was only temporary. It is perhaps a pity in those circumstances that the Government chose to pursue the new arguments, thereby possibly giving the impression that our commitment as a nation to the Rome Statute was in question.

Waiver

[106] We received extensive argument on two propositions to the effect that, even if the Implementation Act did not oust President Al Bashir's head of state immunity, it had been waived, either by the Security Council Resolution 1593 (2005) or, in relation to the second arrest warrant, by the Genocide Convention (1948). In view of my conclusion on the effect of the Implementation Act it is unnecessary to address these submissions. The position under the Security Council Resolution is hotly contested by the commentators and the limited argument we received on the Genocide Convention does not give me confidence that we should express a view on it. I pass therefore to a consideration of the relief granted by the High Court and the question of costs.

The relief

[107] The relief granted by the High Court is set out in paragraph 6 above. The matter having been brought and dealt with as an urgent application the orders were not as well-tailored to the contentions being advanced by SALC as mature consideration would indicate. A broad statement that conduct was inconsistent with the Constitution did little to define where the shortcoming lay. Mr Trengove SC accepted that even if the appeal failed it was desirable that the declaratory order be formulated with greater precision. In my view, an appropriate order would have been the following:

"The conduct of the Respondents in failing to take steps to arrest and detain, for surrender to the International Criminal Court, the President of Sudan, Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir, after his arrival in South Africa on 13 June 2015 to attend the 25th Assembly of the African Union, was inconsistent with South Africa's obligations in terms of the Rome Statute and section 10 of the Implementation of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court Act 27 of 2002, and unlawful."

[108] The second paragraph of the order directed the applicants to take reasonable steps to arrest President Al Bashir without a warrant in terms of section 40(1)(k) of the CPA. I do not think that section has anything to do with a person charged with international crimes under the Rome Statute. It is true that it deals with people who have committed crimes outside South Africa that would have been an offence if committed inside South Africa, which would include international crimes. But it is qualified by the requirement that the person arrested is "under any law relating to extradition or fugitive offenders" liable to arrest and detention in South Africa. That is not the position with an arrest under section 10 of the Implementation Act. That Act is not concerned with extradition, but with surrender to the ICC. Persons arrested thereunder are not necessarily fugitive offenders. After all President Al Bashir continues to tread the world stage and has made appearances at the UN and visited China, as well as a number of other states, in his official capacity as head of state of Sudan, so he is not a fugitive offender.

[109] I am not sure why it was thought necessary to look to the CPA in regard to the possible arrest of President Al Bashir. After all the power to arrest him existed under the Implementation Act. Furthermore he was not to be arrested without a warrant, but in terms of warrants endorsed by a magistrate, one of which was in existence at the time, although SALC did not know that. As paragraph 2 of the order sought by SALC and granted by the High Court was inappropriate, and there is at present no reason to think that the existing arrest warrants will not be dealt with in terms of the Implementation Act and be available to be enforced if President Al Bashir returns to this country, it should simply be deleted. Subject to those amendments to the order the appeal should be dismissed.

Costs

[110] The amendments to the order do not represent substantial success for the applicants. While their arguments in regard to the content of customary international law as it applies under DIPA were accepted, the key statute is the Implementation Act and their arguments in regard to that were unsuccessful. SALC have succeeded in establishing important points of public importance in regard to the Government's obligations under the Rome Statute and the Implementation Act. They should accordingly have their costs, including the costs of two Counsel.

[111] The Foundation's arguments were of great value in dealing with this case and the emphasis they rightly placed on the importance of the Constitution in construing the statutes under consideration was a valuable insight. In my view, they should also have their costs including the costs of the application for admission as amicus curiae and the costs of two Counsel.

[112] As regards the costs incurred by the amici other than the Foundation and the costs of the Government in opposing their applications for admission as amici I have already expressed the view that the amici should not be penalised for their lack of success in securing their admission as amici. The Government must bear its own costs in relation to these applications, as must the amici.

Result

[113] I make the following order:

1. The application for leave to appeal is granted.
2. The applicants are to pay the costs of that application such costs to include those consequent upon the employment of two Counsel.
3. The applications by the African Centre for Justice and Peace Studies, the International Immigration Rights Initiative, the Peace and Justice Initiative and the Centre for Human Rights for admission as amici curiae are dismissed with no order for costs.

4. The order of the High Court is varied to read as follows:

   "1 The conduct of the Respondents in failing to take steps to arrest and detain, for surrender to the International Criminal Court, the President of Sudan, Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir, after his arrival in South Africa on 13 June 2015 to attend the 25th Assembly of the African Union, was inconsistent with South Africa's obligations in terms of the Rome Statute and section 10 of the Implementation of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court Act 27 of 2002, and unlawful.

   2 The applicant is entitled to the costs of the application on a pro bono basis."

5. The appeal is otherwise dismissed.

6. The applicants are to pay the respondent's costs of appeal and the costs of the Helen Suzman Foundation, including the costs of its application for admission as an amicus, such costs to include in both instances the costs consequent upon the employment of two Counsel.

(Majiedt and Shongwe JJA concurred in the judgment of Wallis JA. Lewis and Ponnan JJA concurred for separate reasons in the judgment of Wallis JA.)

Ponnan JA:

[114] I have had the privilege of reading the judgment of Wallis JA, which comprehensively sets out the facts and issues that call for adjudication in the appeal. I feel persuaded to write separately in this matter. Both my approach and the line that I take in endeavouring to resolve it are far narrower than and, in their emphasis, different from that preferred by my learned Colleague.

[115] I agree with Wallis JA that the content of customary international law is not for us to determine.91 Nor can I fault his conclusion that:

"when South Africa decided to implement its obligations under the Rome Statute by passing the Implementation Act it did so on the basis that all forms of immunity, including head of State immunity, would not constitute a bar to the prosecution of international crimes in this country or to South Africa cooperating with the ICC by way of the arrest and surrender of persons charged with such crimes before the ICC, where an arrest warrant had been issued and a request for co-operation made".92

With due deference to my learned Colleague, that conclusion, I daresay, renders his discussion on customary international law unnecessary. I am accordingly hesitant to endorse Wallis JA's discussion on customary international law as also his conclusion on the subject, the high water mark of which is:

"In those circumstances I am unable to hold that at this stage of the development of customary international law there is an international crimes exception to the immunity and inviolability that heads of State enjoy when visiting foreign countries and before foreign national courts."93

[116] More narrowly then, at the heart of the appeal lies the supposed clash between section 4(1)(a) of the DIPA and section 4(2) of the Implementation Act. The clash is said to arise because the former provision recognises an immunity that the latter purportedly negates. Harmonising that clash - a clash that seems to me to be more apparent than real - necessarily disposes of the primary issue in the appeal.

[117] Section 4(1)(a) of the DIPA provides:

"A head of State is immune from the criminal and civil jurisdiction of the courts of the Republic, and enjoys such privileges as -

(a) heads of State enjoy in accordance with the rules of customary international law . . . "

Supposing there was no further legislation, President Al Bashir would have enjoyed immunity from arrest and surrender to the ICC. But there is further and later legislation in the form of the Implementation Act, sec-tion 4(2) of which provides:

"Despite any other law to the contrary, including customary and conventional international law, the fact that a person -

(a) is or was a head of State or government, a member of a government or parliament, an elected representative or a government official; or

(b) being a member of a security service or armed force, was under a legal obligation to obey a manifestly unlawful order of a government or superior, is neither -

(i) a defence to a crime; nor

(ii) a ground for any possible reduction of sentence once a person has been convicted of a crime."

[118] In my view, the apparent conflict can reasonably be reconciled when one applies the appropriate rules of statutory construction. Generally speaking, when the repeal of former legislation is intended, specific words to that effect are employed, but this, however desirable, is not always done, nor is it absolutely necessary. For, as Kotze AJA observed in a separate concurring judgment in New Modderfontein Gold Mining Co v Transvaal Provincial Administration 1919 AD 367 at 397:

"There are many illustrations in the books of the repeal by implication of earlier statutes by later ones, for subsequent legislation repeals previous inconsistent legislation, whether it expressly declares such repeal or not. Such an implied repeal will arise wherever the contents and operation of a later Act are repugnant to or cannot be harmonized with those of an earlier one . . ."

But repeal by implication is not favoured. An interpretation of apparently conflicting statutory provisions which involve the implied repeal of the earlier by the later ought not to be adopted unless it is inevitable (R v Durban Corporation 1946 NPD 109 at 115). Any reasonable construction which offers an escape from that is more likely to be in consonance with the real intention of the Legislature (R v Tucker 1953 (3) SA 150 (A) at 162 [also reported at [1953] 3 All SA 258 (A) - Ed]). As it was put in Wendywood Developments (Pty) Ltd v Rieger and another 1971 (3) SA 28 (A) at 38 [also reported at [1971] 3 All SA 103 (A) - Ed]:

"It is necessary to bear in mind a well-known principle of statutory construction, namely, that statutes must be read together and the later one must not be so construed as to repeal the provisions of the earlier one, unless the later statute expressly alters the provisions of the earlier one or such alteration is a necessary inference from the terms of the

later statute."

[119] I can draw no such inference in this case particularly when regard is had to the nature, purpose and background of the Implementation Act. The preamble to the Implementation Act records that "throughout the history of human-kind, millions of children, women and men have suffered as a result of atrocities which constitute the crimes of genocide, crimes against humanity, war crimes and the crime of aggression in terms of international law." It commits South Africa to "bringing persons who commit such atrocities to justice" either in our own courts, or, in accordance with the principle of complementarity, in the ICC. Section 3 lists the objects of the Implementation Act as being, amongst others to: ensure that the Rome Statute is effectively implemented in South Africa; ensure that South Africa conforms with its obligations under the Rome Statute; and, enable the Republic to co-operate with the ICC by, inter alia, the surrender of suspects for prosecution before the ICC. Section 4(1) provides that any person who commits any of the international crimes is guilty of an offence and liable to conviction and punishment. Section 4(3) vests our courts with universal jurisdiction over the prosecution of all international crimes, wherever they may be committed, provided only that the accused is present in the Republic.

[120] Sections 8, 9 and 10 of the Implementation Act govern the manner in which an ICC request for the arrest of a suspect must be implemented. They do so in mandatory terms. Section 8 caters for an ICC request for the arrest and the surrender of a suspect. Section 8(1) says that the request "must" be referred to the central authority, namely, the Director-General of Justice. Section 8(2) requires the central authority immediately on receipt of that request to forward it to a magistrate who "must" endorse the warrant of arrest for execution. That has happened here in relation to one of the two warrants. Section 9(3) says that a warrant endorsed in terms of section 8 "must" be in a form and be executed in a manner as near as possible to that prescribed for domestic warrants of arrest in South Africa.

[121] Section 10 then comes into play - subsection (1) provides that the suspect "must" be brought before a magistrate within 48 hours, who "must" hold an inquiry to determine: first, whether the warrant applies to the suspect; second, whether the suspect has been arrested in accordance with our domestic law, and third, whether the suspect's constitutional rights have been respected. According to section 10(5), if the magistrate is satisfied that the three requirements have been met and that the suspect may be surrendered to the ICC, he or she "must" order that the suspect be surrendered to the ICC. Tellingly, these provisions leave no room for the suspect to raise any immunity claim or for the magistrate to inquire into and determine such a claim.

[122] Finally, there is section 10(9) of the Implementation Act, which provides:

There is no imperfection in the language of this provision. Its meaning is clear and unambiguous. It applies to any person contemplated in section 4(2)(a) or (b), which includes a sitting or former head of State. Accordingly, the fact that the suspect is a sitting or former head of State does not constitute a ground for refusing an order contemplated in section 10(5) - that is an order that the suspect be surrendered to the ICC. Recognition of head of State immunity alongside the provisions of section 4(2) to preclude someone from being brought to trial in South Africa would create an intolerable anomaly. In terms of section 4(2) of the Implementation Act, a head of State may be arrested and prosecuted before South African domestic courts. The same head of State may be prosecuted before the ICC in terms of article 27 of the Rome Statute. But, when the ICC requests South Africa to arrest and surrender that head of State to the ICC for prosecution, it would be precluded from doing so by virtue of the suspect's immunity. The immunity would not protect him against arrest and prosecution in South Africa but inexplicably protects him from an arrest in South Africa for surrender to the ICC.

[123] The Legislature has thus made a clear choice in section 10(9) to negate the head of State immunity that might otherwise have stood in the way of the arrest and surrender of President Al Bashir. This is not to suggest that section 4(1)(a) of the DIPA has in any way become obsolete or redundant by virtue of the enactment of the Implementation Act. Both enactments address the matter in a slightly different manner. In my view, section 4(1)(a) of the DIPA falls to be read subject to the provisions of the Implementation Act. Or to put it another way, section 4(1)(a) of the DIPA only finds application insofar as the Implementation Act does not. Thus the immunity contemplated by section 4(1)(a) the DIPA can only be validly invoked if it is not in conflict with the Implementation Act. The Legislature has shown, through the Implementation Act, in what respects the more general immunity conferred by section 4(1)(a) of the DIPA is to be excluded. Any other construction would mean that the provisions of the Implementation Act to which I have referred must simply be ignored. Accordingly, section 4(1)(a) of the DIPA continues to govern head of State immunity unless such immunity is excluded by the operation of the Implementation Act. So construed, section 4(1)(a) of the DIPA and section 4(2) of the Implementation Act can stand side by side.

[124] The issues raised are of considerable constitutional and public importance. On any reckoning, even the rather more discrete point of statutory interpretation adopted in this judgment, the matter is appealable.94 For the rest, I agree with the reasoning and orders proposed by Wallis JA.

The Statute operates in terms of the principle of complementarity under which international crimes should in the first instance be prosecuted in national Courts and before the ICC if national Courts are unable or unwilling to do so. National Commissioner of Police v South African Human Rights Litigation Centre and another (CCT 02/14) [2014] ZACC 30*;* 2015 (1) SA 315 (CC) para [30] [also reported as National Commissioner of the South African Police v Southern African Human Rights Litigation Centre and another (Dugard and others as amici curiae) at 2014 (12) BCLR 1428 (CC) - Ed]. 2 Decision following the Prosecutor's request for an order further clarifying that the Republic of South Africa is under the obligation to immediately arrest and surrender Omar Al Bashir ICC-02/05-01/09 Date 13 June 2015. In argument, Counsel for the Government suggested that this judgment was given summarily and late at night, likening it to an unopposed application in a motion Court. That characterisation was unjustified. A reading of the judgment shows that it was only delivered after a consultation between the ICC and the Government of South Africa under art 97 of the Rome Statute.

13 The rule reads as follows:

"Admission as amicus

(1) Subject to this rule, any person interested in any matter before the Court may, with the written consent of all the parties in the matter before the Court given not later than the time specified in subrule (5), be admitted therein as an amicus curiae upon such terms and conditions and with such rights and privileges as may be agreed upon in writing with all the parties before the Court or as may be directed by the President in terms of subrule (3).

Admission by consent

(2) The written consent referred to in subrule (1) shall, within 10 days of it having been obtained, be lodged with the registrar and the amicus curiae shall, in addition to any other provision, comply with the times agreed upon for the lodging of written argument.

Amendment of consent

(3) The President may amend the terms, conditions, rights and privileges agreed upon in terms of subrule (1).

Application to be admitted

(4) If the written consent referred to in subrule (1) has not been secured, any person who has an interest in any matter before the Court may apply to the President to be admitted therein as an amicus curiae, and the President may grant such application upon such terms and conditions and with such rights and privileges as he or she may determine.

Time for application

(5) An application pursuant to the provisions of subrule (4) shall be made within one month after the record has been lodged with the registrar.

Format

(6) An application to be admitted as an amicus curiae shall -

(a) briefly describe the interest of the amicus curiae in the proceedings;

(b) briefly identify the position to be adopted by the amicus curiae in the proceedings;

(c) set out the submissions to be advanced by the amicus curiae, their relevance to the proceedings and his or her reasons for believing that the submissions will be useful to the Court and different from those of the other parties.

Argument

(7) (a) An amicus curiae shall have the right to lodge written argument, provided that such written argument does not repeat any matter set forth in the argument of the other parties and raises new contentions which may be useful to the Court.

(b) The heads of argument of an amicus curiae shall not exceed 20 pages unless a judge, on request, otherwise orders.

Limitations

(8) An amicus curiae shall be limited to the record on appeal and may not add thereto and, unless otherwise ordered by the Court, shall not present oral argument.

Filing of heads

(9) An order granting leave to be admitted as an amicus curiae shall specify the date of lodging the written argument of the amicus curiae or any other relevant matter.

Costs

(10) An order of the Court dealing with costs may make provision for the payment of costs incurred by or as a result of the intervention of the amicus curiae."

14 The Constitutional Court has held in respect of its similarly worded rules governing admission as an amicus (r 10) that consent alone is not sufficient and an application must also be made to the Chief Justice. Ex parte Institute for Security Studies: In re S v Basson (CCT30/2003) [2005] ZACC 4; 2006 (6) SA 195 (SCA) paras [6]-[8]. Although Harms Civil Procedure in the Supreme Court (loose-leaf) C16-1 (issue 51) says that this is equally applicable in the SCA that does not accord with the practice in this Court.

15 This is a material difference from the Constitutional Court rule, which does not limit the length of the written submissions of an amicus. Also in that Court it is the Chief Justice who determines whether an amicus is permitted to make oral submissions, although in practice it is understood that the entire Court has input in that decision. Historically the Constitutional Court has been generous in permitting oral representations by amici. Van Loggerenberg and others Erasmus Superior Court Practice (2ed, loose-leaf) Vol 1, B1-30 (Original Service, 2015). In this Court it is plain that the Court constituted to hear the appeal decides whether the amicus may make oral submissions.

16 Compare Children's Institute v Presiding Officer of the Children's Court, Krugersdorp and others (CCT 69/12) [2012] ZACC 25; 2013 (2) SA 620 (CC) [also reported at 2013 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) - Ed]. That dealt with r 16A in the Uniform Rules of Court, which does not contain a provision that an amicus is confined to the record on appeal. In the Constitutional Court an amicus is confined to the record on appeal (r 10(8)) subject to the right in terms of r 31 to submit additional facts that are common cause or otherwise incontrovertible or are of an official, scientific technical or statistical nature and capable of easy verification. The SCA has a limited power to permit the leading of additional evidence on appeal, but the Court has not had to consider whether that power can be exercised on the application of an amicus.

17 In re: Certain Amicus Curiae Applications: Minister of Health and others v Treatment Action Campaign and others 2002 (5) SA 713 (CC) para [5] [also reported at 2002 (10) BCLR 1023 (CC) - Ed] which reads:

> "The role of an amicus is to draw the attention of the Court to relevant matters of law and fact to which attention would not otherwise be drawn. In return for the privilege of participating in the proceedings without having to qualify as a party, an amicus has a special duty to the Court. That duty is to provide cogent and helpful submissions that assist the Court. The amicus must not repeat arguments already made but must raise new contentions; and generally these new contentions must be raised on the data already before the Court. Ordinarily it is inappropriate for an amicus to try to introduce new contentions based on fresh evidence."

18 See generally Koyabe and others v Minister for Home Affairs and others (CCT 53/08) [2009] ZACC 23; 2010 (4) SA 327 (CC) para [80] [also reported as Koyabe and others v Minister for Home Affairs and others (Lawyers for Human Rights as amicus curiae) at 2009 (12) BCLR 1192 (CC) - Ed] where it is stated that:

> "Amici curiae have made and continue to make an invaluable contribution to this Court's jurisprudence. Most, if not all, constitutional matters present issues, the resolution of which will invariably have an impact beyond the parties directly litigating before the Court. Constitutional litigation by its very nature requires the determination of issues squarely in the public interest, and insofar as amici introduce additional, new and relevant perspectives, leading to more nuanced judicial decisions, their participation in litigation is to be welcomed and encouraged."

The qualification to their usefulness must be observed.

19 I have already drawn attention to the fact that r 16 makes no provision for such opposition so that there was nothing untoward in the Deputy President making an order on the application as it stood.

20 The Preamble to the Rome Statute contains the following: "Emphasising that the International Criminal Court established under this statute shall be complementary to national criminal jurisdictions".

Counsel for the Government did not pursue such an argument, which ignores that these articles are only mentioned in the context of saying that the members of the Commission and Staff Members and delegates and other representatives of Inter-Governmental Organisations are to enjoy those privileges. It clearly goes no further than that.

Professor De Wet regards the reasoning in the later decisions as preferable. In other words, she supports the approach of the removal of immunity by the Security Council. 90 My colleague Ponnan JA in his separate judgment says that this conclusion, which he shares, may render the discussion on customary international law unnecessary. With respect I do not agree. Until one reaches the conclusion that under customary international law President Al Bashir would ordinarily enjoy immunity a discussion of the relevant provisions of the Implementation Act is irrelevant. One cannot construe the provisions of the Implementation Act as removing an immunity that does not exist. If there was no such immunity, because there is an international crimes exception as contended by SALC, then the relevant sections of the Implementation Act merely reflect the provisions of customary international law and do not depart from them. That is an entirely different interpretation from the one in the body of this judgment and would involve a different analysis of the Implementation Act on the footing that it reflected, not overrode, customary international law.

Introduction

1. The topic "Immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction" was included in the long-term programme of work of the International Law Commission at its fifty-eighth session, in 2006, on the basis of the proposal in the report of the Commission on the work of that session.[1] At its fifty-ninth session, in 2007, the Commission decided to include this topic in its current programme of work and appointed Mr. Roman A. Kolodkin as Special Rapporteur.[2] At the same session, the Secretariat was requested to prepare a background study on the topic.[3]

2. Special Rapporteur Kolodkin submitted three reports, in which he established the boundaries within which the topic should be considered and analysed various aspects of the substantive and procedural questions relating to the immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction.[4] The Commission considered the reports of the Special Rapporteur at its sixtieth and sixty-third sessions, held in 2008 and 2011, respectively. The Sixth Committee of the General Assembly dealt with the topic during its consideration of the report of the Commission, particularly in 2008 and 2011.

3. At its 3132nd meeting, held on 22 May 2012, the Commission appointed Concepción Escobar Hernández as Special Rapporteur to replace Mr. Kolodkin, who was no longer a member of the Commission.[5]

4. At the same session, the Special Rapporteur submitted a preliminary report on the immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction.[6] That report helped to clarify the terms of the debate up to that point, identified the principal points of contention which remained, the topics to be considered and the methodology to be followed, and set out a workplan for consideration of the topic over the present quinquennium. The Commission examined the preliminary report at its sixty-fourth session, in 2012,[7] and the Sixth Committee examined it at its sixty-seventh session.[8] In both cases, the Special Rapporteur's proposals were approved.

5. At the Commission's sixty-fifth session, in 2013, the Special Rapporteur submitted a second report on the immunity of State officials from foreign criminal

In addition, two States referred to the topic at another meeting (ibid.,19th meeting (A/C.6/67/SR.19)). jurisdiction.[9] The report examined the scope of the topic and of the draft articles, the concepts of immunity and jurisdiction, the distinction between immunity ratione personae and immunity ratione materiae, and the normative elements of immunity ratione personae, proposing six draft articles. The Commission considered the second report of the Special Rapporteur[10] and provisionally adopted three draft articles, dealing respectively with the scope of the draft articles (draft article 1) and the normative elements of immunity ratione personae (draft articles 3 and 4)[11] together with the commentaries thereto. The Drafting Committee decided to keep the draft article on definitions under review and to take action on it at a later stage.[12] The Sixth Committee examined the Special Rapporteur's second report at its sixty-eighth session, held in 2013, welcoming the report and the progress made by the Commission.[13]

6. At the sixty-sixth session of the Commission, in 2014, the Special Rapporteur submitted the third report on the immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction.[14] She commenced with an analysis of the normative elements of immunity ratione materiae, focusing on the general concept of "State official" in the subjective context of immunity ratione materiae (persons enjoying immunity), analysed the terminology to be used in referring to State officials and proposed two draft articles. The Commission considered the third report of the Special Rapporteur at its 3217th to 3222nd meetings[15] and provisionally adopted the draft articles dealing with the general concept of "State official"(draft article 2 (e)) and "Persons enjoying immunity ratione materiae" (draft article 5),[16] together with the commentaries thereto.[17] At its sixty-ninth session, the Sixth Committee examined the topic of immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction as part of its consideration of the annual report of the International Law Commission. States welcomed the third report of the Special Rapporteur and the two new draft articles provisionally adopted by the Commission, highlighting the significant progress made on the topic.[18]

7. At the sixty-seventh session of the Commission, in 2015, the Special Rapporteur submitted the fourth report on the immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction,[19] which continued the analysis of the normative elements of immunity ratione materiae, addressing the substantive and temporal aspects in detail, and proposed two draft articles. The Commission examined the Special Rapporteur's fourth report at its 3271st to 3278th meetings[20] and decided to refer the two draft articles to the Drafting Committee. The Drafting Committee provisionally adopted draft articles 2 (f) (definition of "act performed in an official capacity") and 6 (scope of immunity ratione materiae).[21] The Commission took note of these draft articles and decided that the commentaries thereto would be considered at the current session.[22] At its seventieth session, the Sixth Committee examined the topic of immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction as part of its consideration of the annual report of the Commission. States again welcomed the Special Rapporteur's fourth report and the two new draft articles provisionally adopted by the Drafting Committee and highlighted the progress made on the topic by the Commission.[23]

8. Starting in 2013, the Commission has addressed various questions to States on issues of interest to the topic of immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction. In 2014, ten States submitted comments: Belgium, Czech Republic, Germany, Ireland, Mexico, Norway, Russian Federation, Switzerland, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and United States of America.[24] In 2015, the following States submitted contributions: Austria, Czech Republic, Cuba, Finland, France, Germany, Netherlands, Peru, Poland, Spain, United Kingdom and Switzerland.[25] In 2016, at the time when the present report was finalized, written replies had been received from the following States: Australia, Austria, Netherlands, Paraguay, Peru, Spain and Switzerland.[26] In addition, several States referred in their statements in the Sixth Committee to the issues raised in the Commission's requests. The Special Rapporteur wishes to thank those States for their comments, which are invaluable to the work of the Commission. She would also welcome any other comments that States may wish to submit at a later date. The comments received, as well as the observations contained in the oral statements by delegations in the Sixth Committee, were duly taken into account in the preparation of the present report.

9. As already announced in 2015, the present report analyses the limitations and exceptions to the immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction. It deals successively with the Commission's consideration of this issue over the two quinquenniums during which it has been dealing with the topic (chapter I), the analysis of relevant practice (chapter II), some methodological and conceptual questions relating to limitations and exceptions (chapter III), and instances in which the immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction does not apply (chapter IV). On the basis of this study, a draft article is proposed. The report also contains a reference to the future workplan (chapter V). Lastly, in order to facilitate the Commission's consideration of this report, it has three annexes containing draft articles provisionally adopted by the Commission (annex I), draft articles provisionally adopted by the Drafting Committee and of which the Commission has taken note (annex II) and a draft article proposed in this report (annex III).

I. Limitations and exceptions to the immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction: introduction

A. General considerations

10. As already pointed out by the Special Rapporteur, the issue of limitations and exceptions to immunity should be addressed once the analysis of the normative elements of immunity ratione personae and immunity ratione materiae has been completed. This is for the obvious reason that only after examining the basic elements that define the general regime applicable in abstract terms to immunity from foreign criminal jurisdiction is it possible to address the complex question of whether that general regime may be subject to limitations and exceptions. In addition, it has been pointed out that the issue of limitations and exceptions to immunity must be analysed both comprehensively and with reference to the two types of immunity referred to above.

11. The issue of limitations and exceptions to immunity has traditionally been considered from the perspective of the acts that can be covered by immunity. Consequently, some publicists and States have focused on the relationship between immunity from foreign criminal jurisdiction and jus cogens, serious and systematic violations of human rights, international crimes and efforts to combat impunity. On the other hand, other publicists and States have concentrated on attribution of the official's act to the State, emphasizing the characterization of the official's immunity as the State's immunity. In addition, the question of limitations and exceptions to immunity has also been considered from a different angle essentially concerning the representative character of persons enjoying immunity ratione personae. Nevertheless, also in relation to this category of immunity, the existence or non-existence of limitations and exceptions thereto has been linked in some way to the nature of the act performed by these State officials.

12. The wealth of recent publications on the immunity of the State and its officials has demonstrated that the issue of limitations and exceptions constitutes one of the major concerns of the international legal community.[27] The same concern is reflected in the series of resolutions that have been adopted to date by the Institut de Droit International and which contain references to limitations and exceptions to immunity.[28] The same can be said of other indirect contributions to the literature on our topic, including the Princeton Principles on Universal Jurisdiction.[29]

13. However, this focus on limitations and exceptions to immunity is not only theoretical or doctrinal. On the contrary, the discussion concerning the judgments of the European Court of Human Rights, especially in the Al-Adsani and Jones cases,[30] demonstrates that the issue of limitations and exceptions to sovereign immunity has a very important practical dimension. In addition, the judgment of the International

Court of Justice in the case of Jurisdictional Immunities of the State,[31] has placed the close relationship between immunity and several key concepts of contemporary international law, especially jus cogens, at the forefront of the debate. Moreover, it will be remembered that domestic courts have also ruled on the question of limitations and exceptions to the immunity from criminal jurisdiction of the officials of a foreign State in the regular exercise of their judicial functions, some of which have had an important social and media impact and been extensively covered in legal discussions and writings. The Pinochet case, in which Spanish and British courts were involved, can no doubt be considered as having prompted the current discussion on the immunities of State officials and exceptions thereto. Two recent judgments by domestic courts have also complicated the problem. The first is the 22 October 2014 judgment of the Italian Constitutional Tribunal concerning the application in Italy of the judgment of the International Court of Justice in Jurisdictional Immunities of the State.[32] The second is the judgment issued in February this year by the Supreme Court of Appeal of South Africa in the case of the request for the arrest of President Al-Bashir following the warrant issued by the International Criminal Court.[33] Lastly, it will also be remembered that the question of limitations and exceptions to immunity is the crux of the more recent developments concerning international criminal jurisdiction, as exemplified by various decisions of the African Union, particularly the Protocol on Amendments to the Protocol on the Statute of the African Court of Justice and Human Rights, which created an international criminal law section in that Court.[34]

14. Consequently, any work of the Commission on the immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction would be incomplete without consideration of the limitations and exceptions to such immunity. However, such analysis should not be limited to the relationship between international crimes and immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction, even though that issue certainly constitutes the central and most controversial aspect of the question. Indeed, there are other examples in practice that should also be analysed from the perspective of limitations and exceptions to immunity. Moreover, this report must also take into consideration a series of questions of general import without which the consideration of limitations and exceptions to immunity would be incomplete. The main goal of the report is therefore to consider in detail the issue of limitations and exceptions to immunity, starting with an introductory analysis of prior work by the Commission over the two most recent quinquenniums.

B. Prior consideration by the Commission of limitations and exceptions to the immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction

15. The limitations and exceptions to immunity are undoubtedly one of the central issues to be considered by the Commission in its work on this topic, and is also a highly politically sensitive issue. It therefore comes as no surprise that the issue of limitations and exceptions has been covered in the various reports submitted for the Commission's consideration and has been the subject of an ongoing debate within the Commission, to the point where in fact some of its members consider the issue to be the very purpose, and even the only purpose, of the present topic. The importance attached to this issue is also reflected in the statements made by delegations in the Sixth Committee, which have repeatedly referred to the limitations and exceptions to immunity during the consideration of the annual report of the Commission, as well as in the written contributions provided by States in response to questions posed by the Commission.

16. It will be recalled that the subject of limitations and exceptions to the immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction was analysed in detail in the Memorandum by the Secretariat,[35] as well as in the second report of the former Special Rapporteur, Mr. Kolodkin, one section of which was devoted to a case study of exceptions to immunity.[36] On the basis of that study, Mr. Kolodkin concluded that there is in contemporary international law no customary norm (or trend toward the establishment of such a norm) making it possible to assert that there are exceptions to immunity, apart from the exception concerning harm caused directly in the forum State when that State did not consent to the performance of the act or to the presence of the foreign official in its territory.[37] He added that further restrictions on immunity, even de lege ferenda, were not desirable, since they could impair the stability of international relations; he also questioned their effect on efforts to combat impunity.[38]

17. In her preliminary report, the present Special Rapporteur highlighted the lack of consensus within the Commission on the issue of limitations and exceptions to immunity, while drawing attention to the need to analyse the topic during the present quinquennium, with the goal of finding the appropriate place for exceptions to immunity, particularly in the case of international crimes, in the definition of the legal regime applicable both to immunity ratione personae and to immunity ratione materiae. In addition, emphasis was placed on the need to approach the question in the light of the values and legal principles that are affected by immunity, from the perspective both of the values protected by immunity (sovereign equality of the State, stability of international relations) and of other values and legal principles that could be affected by the existence of immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction. Lastly, the preliminary report also referred to the need to approach the issue of immunity — including the question of exceptions — from the perspective of both lex ferenda and lex lata, thus fulfilling the Commission's dual mandate encompassing both the codification and the progressive development of international law.[39]

18. In her following reports, the Special Rapporteur did not deal directly with the question of limitations and exceptions to immunity, although in the three reports submitted for the Commission's consideration in 2013, 2014 and 2015 she expressed a reservation regarding subsequent consideration of this question. Accordingly, none of the analyses contained in those reports and none of the draft articles included therein should be understood as a pronouncement on the existence or otherwise of exceptions to immunity.[40] In addition, it will be recalled that the fourth report contained an indirect analysis of the issue of limitations and exceptions to immunity in connection with the study of the concept of "acts performed in an official capacity" and already mentioned some of the elements that are developed in detail in this report.[41]

19. All this prior work shows the context within which the Commission's discussion to date on limitations and exceptions to immunity has taken place. Although the question will again be discussed, this time in the form of a case study, in view of the consideration of the present report at the current session, it is useful at this point to reiterate the issues and arguments concerning this question that have been raised by Commission members to date. These arguments can be summarized as follows:

(a) Although some Commission members have maintained that there are no exceptions to immunity, they are in the minority.[42] Indeed, a number of members have admitted that there are instances in which the application of immunity is not possible, although their positions are not identical in all respects.[43]

(b) The commission of international crimes is considered to be the main instance in which immunity would not be applicable. In addition, other examples of exceptions or limitations have been mentioned by Commission members, including ultra vires acts, acta jure gestionis, performance of functions that are ostensibly connected with official status but are in fact for the exclusive benefit of the State official (especially acts of corruption and misappropriation of State funds), and instances in which the official's act causes harm to persons or property in the territory of the forum State, usually referred to as the "territorial tort exception".[44]

(c) Some Commission members have argued that conduct characterized as being contrary to jus cogens is a basis for limitations and exceptions to immunity. However, this argument has been put forward not as an autonomous and absolute criterion but in relation to efforts to combat impunity for international crimes, to serious human rights violations and to protection of the fundamental values of contemporary international law.[45]

(d) International crimes have been identified mainly as the crime of genocide, crimes against humanity, war crimes and the crime of aggression.[46] One Commission member has referred simply to crimes listed in the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court,[47] as a means of identifying crimes generally viewed as such by the international community.[48]

(e) International crimes have been mentioned by some Commission members as exceptions to immunity,[49] while others have seen them as conduct that can never be part of State functions and which therefore cannot even be considered as acts performed in an official capacity.[50] In both cases, however, when Commission members have advanced these arguments, they have done so with the aim of precluding application of the rules concerning immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction.

(f) With a few exceptions, most of the Commission members who have expressed an opinion on the matter have stated that exceptions to immunity do not apply to persons enjoying immunity ratione personae (Head of State, Head of Government and Minister for Foreign Affairs) during their term in office. They would, however, apply after that term has ended.[51]

(g) A large number of Commission members have maintained that immunity ratione materiae is indeed covered by the above-mentioned exceptions and limitations.[52]

(h) Some Commission members have stated that there is no norm of international law concerning exceptions to immunity and that international practice is limited and inconsistent. Thus the Commission either cannot take exceptions into account or must deal with them prudently and cautiously.[53]

(i) On the other hand, those who have been in favour of exceptions and limitations consider that either it is possible to point to the existence of norms allowing exceptions or, even if is debatable whether they exist at the customary level, it is possible to identify a clear and growing trend toward exceptions to immunity, particularly in the case of international crimes.[54] They have also noted that the inconsistent and inconclusive nature of practice cannot be construed to mean solely that there are no exceptions to immunity. Consequently, the Commission can consider them in the exercise of its mandate, which includes both the codification and the progressive development of international law. In this connection, some Commission members have drawn attention to the fact that it is precisely the lack of consistent and conclusive practice that allows the Commission to opt for inclusion of exceptions, particularly in order to ensure consistency of the draft articles with other legal norms and principles enshrined in contemporary international law, which must be viewed as a normative whole.[55]

(j) Commission members generally have acknowledged the need to preserve the progress made over the last few decades in international criminal law, especially regarding the consolidation of efforts to combat impunity as a goal of the international community. However, Commission members have drawn varying conclusions from this affirmation. For example, some have emphasized that impunity and immunity are different concepts and that immunity is exclusively procedural and not substantive in nature, concluding that the non-existence of exceptions in no way affects efforts to combat impunity. Others, on the contrary, have pointed out that in certain circumstances immunity may have substantive connotations or consequences that would preclude effective individual criminal responsibility. In this context, it is essential to define exceptions or limitations to immunity in order to ensure that immunity does not become a form of impunity.[56]

(k) Lastly, it should be noted that some Commission members who support the existence of exceptions have mentioned the need for such exceptions to be accompanied by recognition of procedural safeguards to prevent them from being misused.[57]

20. Together with this discussion within the Commission, attention should be drawn to the fact that, when analysing the Commission's work on this subject, States have referred at length to the question of limitations and exceptions to the immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction, both in the discussions held in the Sixth Committee and in the written contributions provided in response to questions posed by the Commission. An analysis of the positions maintained by States leads to the following conclusions:

(a) States attach considerable importance to questions related to exceptions and limitations to immunity, to which they have referred repeatedly since the first debate on immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction was held in 2008.[58] In addition, a number of States have drawn attention to the need to approach the question cautiously,[59] with some delegations emphasizing the need to consider first existing law (lex lata) and then proposals for progressive development (lex ferenda). However, it is also noteworthy that there is no clear consensus among States as to which questions concerning exceptions would be included in each of the two categories.[60]

(b) Exceptions to immunity have been viewed by States from two different perspectives: their effect on the goal sought by immunities, on the one hand, and their relationship to efforts to combat immunity for the most serious international crimes, on the other.[61]

(c) The proponents of the first approach have warned of the damage that recognition of any type of exception might do to the exercise of the State's own functions, the risk of submission of politically motivated requests and the harm that limitation of immunity might do to the stability of inter-State relations.[62]

(d) In the second approach, other States have drawn attention to the need to take into account the developments that have occurred in international criminal law in recent decades, as well as the need for the Commission to consider the question of immunities in general, and exceptions in particular, in a manner consistent with the rest of the norms and principles in force in contemporary international law. Those States have mentioned, in particular, the fact that the treatment given to exceptions should not undermine the progress achieved in international criminal law, including the progress that has occurred in the process of creating and establishing international criminal tribunals.[63] Those States believe that international crimes should be considered, prima facie, as exceptions to immunity.[64]

(e) With one exception, States have supported full or absolute immunity ratione personae for the Head of State, the Head of Government and the Minister for Foreign Affairs, with no exception, even for international crimes, during their term of office.[65]

(f) However, a large number of States have supported the existence of various exceptions to immunity ratione materiae, the main one being the commission of the most serious crimes of concern to the international community as a whole,[66] although some States have referred to other exceptions to immunity, such as acts of sabotage, espionage or other harm done by the official of the foreign State in the territory of the forum State.[67]

(g) In referring to international crimes, States have made special mention of the crime of genocide, crimes against humanity, war crimes and serious violations of international humanitarian law, torture and enforced disappearance.[68]

(h) The commission of international crimes has been considered by some States to be an exception that is already enshrined in contemporary international law, while others have maintained that it reflects a growing trend that could not be ignored by the Commission in its work.[69]

(i) Lastly, it is noteworthy that most States refer to "exceptions to immunity", using the term "limits" or "limitations" residually.

21. In preparing this report, the Special Rapporteur has taken into account this past history of consideration of the question of limitations and exceptions to immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction.

II. Study of practice

22. As already mentioned in earlier reports submitted by the Special Rapporteur, the study of practice is an essential foundation of this work. Accordingly, the following pages contain an analysis of treaty practice (section A), national legislative practice (section B), international judicial practice (section C), national judicial practice (section D) and other prior work of the Commission that is of relevance to the present report (section E).

A. Treaty practice

23. The various conventions analysed in earlier reports also include provisions that may be germane to the question of limitations and exceptions. However, as a general observation, it should be noted that none of them use this terminology. In fact, they adopt a more general and pragmatic approach to the question, referring to instances in which the convention, or one of its provisions, does not apply.

24. Starting with the conventions that directly or indirectly govern immunity, it is noteworthy that the ones which regulate the exercise of the diplomatic function do not contain provisions contemplating any form of exception or limitation to immunity as regards criminal jurisdiction. On the contrary, they recognize the immunity from criminal jurisdiction of persons enjoying immunity in absolute terms during the person's term in office. This is established in article 31, paragraph 1, of the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations,[70] in article 31, paragraph 1, of the Convention on Special Missions[71] and in articles 30, paragraph 1, and 60, paragraph 1, of the Vienna Convention on the Representation of States in their Relations with International Organizations of a Universal Character.[72] It is also noteworthy that the provisions mentioned mainly describe a model of immunity ratione personae and that immunity therefore covers both acts performed in an official capacity and acts performed in a private capacity. In the case of the first two conventions, however, the forum State has an alternative mechanism that it can use to deal with instances in which an individual enjoying immunity has committed or is committing a crime: designation of the person concerned as "persona non grata" or "not acceptable", in which case the person must leave the national territory.[73] In any case, it should be remembered that such immunity is of limited duration and that, after the functions have ended, it is no longer absolute, since it applies solely to acts performed in an official capacity.[74] However, these conventions do not define exceptions applicable to this residual immunity ratione materiae as regards criminal jurisdiction.

25. The Vienna Convention on Consular Relations,[75] for its part, adopts a different approach, since the system of immunities follows a model of immunity ratione materiae linked to acts specific to the consular function and also applies in the case of criminal jurisdiction,[76] where the consular official and the other staff of the consular office enjoy not absolute immunity but immunity limited to acts performed in an official capacity.[77] Lastly, it should be noted that article 43, paragraph 2 (b), of the Convention establishes a sort of "territorial tort exception".

26. In concluding this study of the conventions governing immunity, it should be noted that, for the purposes of the present report, the United Nations Convention on Jurisdictional Immunities of States and Their Property[78] is in principle less relevant than the other conventions, since it refers to immunity from jurisdiction of the State and not to immunity from jurisdiction of State officials. Furthermore, it does not apply to immunity from criminal jurisdiction. However, it is of interest for other reasons. Firstly, as regards methodology, it is noteworthy that the Convention does not distinguish between limitations and exceptions to immunity, addressing them under the same heading: "Proceedings in which State immunity cannot be invoked".[79] Secondly, it includes the "territorial tort exception" among those instances. Lastly, it does not recognize any exception or limitation based on violation of jus cogens norms.

27. Article 12 of the Convention (Personal injuries and damage to property) states that:

> "Unless otherwise agreed between the States concerned, a State cannot invoke immunity from jurisdiction before a court of another State which is otherwise competent in a proceeding which relates to pecuniary compensation for death or injury to the person, or damage to or loss of tangible property, caused by an act or omission which is alleged to be attributable to the State, if the act or omission occurred in whole or in part in the territory of that other State and if the author of the act or omission was present in that territory at the time of the act or omission."

28. This precept follows the precedent of the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations[80] and the Vienna Convention on the Representation of States in their Relations with International Organizations of a Universal Character.[81] It was also contemplated in the European Convention on State Immunity,[82] which provides in its article 11 that:

> "A Contracting State cannot claim immunity from the jurisdiction of a court of another Contracting State in proceedings which relate to redress for injury to the person or damage to tangible property, if the facts which occasioned the injury or damage occurred in the territory of the State of the forum, and if the author of the injury or damage was present in that territory at the time when those facts occurred."

29. Article 12 of the Convention on the Jurisdictional Immunities of States and Their Property reproduces almost verbatim the draft article adopted at the time by the Commission.[83] In the opinion of the Commission, the above-mentioned rule constitutes an exception to State immunity from jurisdiction,[84] justified by application of the jurisdictional principle of lex loci delicti commissi and the preponderance of the role played in this case by the territorial element.[85] In addition, the exception satisfies the requirement that the individuals concerned must be guaranteed access to recourse, which would probably not be the case if there were to [79] See Part III of the Convention, arts. 10-17. The instances mentioned in that Part fit into both the category of limitations and the category of exceptions to immunity.

[80] Art. 43, para. 2 (b), of the Convention establishes an exception to immunity from civil jurisdiction when the action is brought "by a third party for damage arising from an accident in the receiving State caused by a vehicle, vessel or aircraft".

[81] Art. 60, para. 4, concerning members of delegations to international conferences, states that "Nothing in this article shall exempt such persons from the civil and administrative jurisdiction of the host State in relation to an action for damages arising from an accident caused by a vehicle, vessel or aircraft, used or owned by the persons in question, where those damages are not recoverable from insurance".

be immunity.[86] Lastly, although the "territorial tort exception" established in the Convention is designed to apply to civil jurisdiction, the Commission noted in its commentaries that it could also be used in relation to claims relating to "intentional physical harm such as assault and battery, malicious damage to property, arson or even homicide, including political assassination".[87] If, in addition, one considers the fact that the Commission understood the words "author of the act" to mean agents or officials of a State exercising their official functions and not necessarily the State itself as a legal person",[88] then an exception of this kind can conceivably play some role in the context of immunity from criminal jurisdiction.

30. The idea of incorporating in the Convention on the Jurisdictional Immunities of States and Their Property an exception connected with violation of jus cogens norms was broached at a late stage, at the end of the negotiation process on the Convention, when the General Assembly requested the Commission to review some questions still pending from that process, as well as to consider new elements which had emerged in practice after its draft articles were adopted in 1991. The Commission set up a Working Group for this purpose, which in an annex to its report drew the attention of the General Assembly to:

> "the argument increasingly put forward that immunity should be denied in the case of death or personal injury resulting from acts of a State in violation of human rights norms having the character of jus cogens, particularly the prohibition on torture".[89]

31. The Commission based its commentary on judicial practice followed in earlier years, especially in relation to the Pinochet case, concluding that these facts "are a recent development relating to immunity which should not be ignored".[90] Although the question was discussed in the Working Group of the Sixth Committee conducting the final negotiations on the future Convention, the exception was not incorporated in the text because it was considered that the issue, "although of current interest, did not really fit into the [draft Convention]" and that "[f]urthermore, it did not seem to be ripe enough for the Working Group to engage in a codification exercise over it".[91] Nevertheless, some States made declarations upon ratifying the Convention, in order to safeguard international protection of human rights in that connection.[92] In any case, the discussion on this exception is ongoing, having picked up steam since the judgment of the International Court of Justice in the case of Jurisdictional Immunities of the State.

[92] In this connection, it is the understanding of Finland, Liechtenstein, Norway, Sweden and Switzerland that the current regulation provided by the Convention is "without prejudice to future developments in international law concerning the protection of human rights". Italy, for its part, declared that the Convention should be interpreted "in accordance with the principles concerning the protection of human rights from serious violations" (TREATIES III-13).

32. In addition to these conventions referring directly to immunity, there is also an interesting group of treaties falling within the scope of international human rights law and international criminal law with provisions concerning individual criminal responsibility that are relevant to the purposes of the present report. This group includes the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide,[93] the International Convention on the Suppression and Punishment of the Crime of Apartheid,[94] the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment,[95] the International Convention for the Protection of All Persons from Enforced Disappearance,[96] the Inter-American Convention to Prevent and Punish Torture[97] and the Inter-American Convention on Forced Disappearance of Persons.[98]

33. The Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide indirectly postulates the irrelevance of official status by stating in its article IV that "[p]ersons committing genocide or any of the other acts enumerated in article III shall be punished, whether they are constitutionally responsible rulers, public officials or private individuals." The International Convention on the Suppression and Punishment of the Crime of Apartheid, for its part, states that "[i]nternational criminal responsibility shall apply, irrespective of the motive involved, to individuals, members of organizations and institutions and representatives of the State, whether residing in the territory of the State in which the acts are perpetrated or in some other State" (article III). On the other hand, the remaining Conventions do not contain similar provisions: the International Convention for the Protection of All Persons from Enforced Disappearance simply refers to "any person" in its enumeration of those who will be held responsible for that crime (article 6, paragraph 1 (a)). However, both the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment and the International Convention for the Protection of All Persons from Enforced Disappearance include "agents of the State" when defining the crime,[99] indicating that they may be held criminally responsible for such acts even when they acted in an official capacity. Consequently, it appears at first sight — and subject to comments to be made below — that the cited conventions provide grounds for concluding that commission of a crime of genocide, apartheid, torture or enforced disappearance may constitute prima facie an exception to immunity from criminal jurisdiction.

34. However, this conclusion will be tenable on the basis of the cited conventions only when the State party is expressly obliged to exercise its criminal jurisdiction in order to prosecute persons presumed to have committed the crimes in question, regardless of their nationality. In this connection, it should be noted that all these conventions, with the exception of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide and the International Convention for the Suppression and Punishment of the Crime of Apartheid,[100] include provisions requiring States parties to establish jurisdiction when the crimes are committed in any territory under their jurisdiction[101] and when the presumed perpetrator is located in any territory under their jurisdiction, unless the criminal is extradited or surrendered to another State or to a competent international criminal jurisdiction.[102]

35. Lastly, it should be noted that the crimes of genocide,[103] enforced disappearance,[104] and apartheid[105] have been declared to be international crimes or crimes under international law by the conventions analysed above. Torture has also been declared to be "an offense against human dignity and a denial of the principles set forth in the Charter of the Organization of American States and in the Charter of the United Nations", as well as a violation of "the fundamental human rights and freedoms proclaimed in the American Declaration of the Rights and Duties of Man and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights".[106] This is important in order to determine what should be understood to be international crimes for the purposes of the exceptions referred to in this report.

[100] The Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide states in its article VI that persons charged with that crime "shall be tried by a competent tribunal of the State in the territory of which the act was committed, or by such international penal tribunal as may have jurisdiction with respect to those Contracting Parties which shall have accepted its jurisdiction". Similarly, article V of the International Convention on the Suppression and Punishment of the Crime of Apartheid establishes that persons charged with that crime "may be tried by a competent tribunal of any State Party to the Convention which may acquire jurisdiction over the person of the accused or by an international penal tribunal having jurisdiction with respect to those States Parties which shall have accepted its jurisdiction".

36. A parallel example is the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, which expressly recognizes the irrelevance of official capacity in determining individual criminal responsibility (article 27, paragraph 1), the inapplicability to the Court of immunities under national or international law (article 27, paragraph 2), as well as the general principle of the irrelevance of compliance with orders of a Government or of a superior in determining individual criminal responsibility (article 33). The rules cited are designed to avoid instances in which the responsibility of the individual can be evaded as a consequence of the individual's special relationship with the State, in order to eliminate loopholes that would otherwise allow the most serious crimes that concern the international community as a whole to be committed with impunity. This emphasis placed by the Rome Statute on the absolute character of international crimes in order to define the individual criminal responsibility of any person and the consequent declaration of the non-applicability of immunities cannot be ignored in the present report. However, the cited provisions and their effect on exceptions to the immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction will be analysed in greater detail chapter III, section B infra.

37. Lastly, it is noteworthy that the conventions on corruption cover the possibility of acts of corruption being committed by officials of a foreign State,[107] which undoubtedly could give rise to a claim of immunity from foreign criminal jurisdiction when a State's courts attempt to exercise jurisdiction over the officials. However, the cited conventions do not contain general provisions referring to such immunity, the only exceptions being certain provisions included in the Council of Europe Criminal Law Convention on Corruption,[108] in the United Nations Convention against Corruption[109] and in the African Union Convention on Preventing and Combating Corruption,[110] which all contain provisions referring to immunity albeit with clearly different approaches and effects as regards limitations and exceptions.

38. The Council of Europe Criminal Law Convention on Corruption states in its article 16 (Immunity):

[107] See, for example, the United Nation Convention against Corruption, arts. 16 and 17; the Criminal Law Convention on Corruption, arts. 5 and 6; and the Inter-American Convention against Corruption [(Caracas, 29 March 1996). E/1996/99], art. VIII. All these provisions make express reference to the participation in an act of corruption of an official of the foreign State. The African Union Convention on Preventing and Combating Corruption does not refer specifically to foreign officials. However, the broad definition of "public official" given in article 1, together with the provisions of article 13 on the establishment of national jurisdiction over acts of corruption, indicates that the Convention can also be applied to foreign officials and that therefore the question of immunity can also be raised before the courts of States parties.

> "The provisions of this Convention shall be without prejudice to the provisions of any Treaty, Protocol or Statute, as well as their implementing texts, as regards the withdrawal of immunity."

Despite the unclear wording, the Explanatory Report to the Convention states that "[t]he Convention recognizes the obligation of each of the institutions concerned to give effect to the provisions governing privilege and immunities", and that "customary international law is not excluded in this field".[111]

39. The United Nations Convention against Corruption, for its part, states in its article 30, paragraph 2, that:

> "Each State Party shall take such measures as may be necessary to establish or maintain, in accordance with its legal system and constitutional principles, an appropriate balance between any immunities or jurisdictional privileges accorded to its public officials for the performance of their functions and the possibility, when necessary, of effectively investigating, prosecuting and adjudicating offences established in accordance with this Convention."

Although the Convention refers to immunities under national law protecting national officials, it uses the concept of "appropriate balance", which may also be relevant for the purpose of defining the system of limitations and exceptions to the immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction.

40. A similar focus, but with a stronger wording, is to be found in the African Union Convention on Preventing and Combating Corruption, which refers to immunities in the following terms (article 7, paragraph 5):

> "Subject to the provisions of domestic legislation, any immunity granted to public officials shall not be an obstacle to the investigation of allegations against and the prosecution of such officials."

41. Lastly, attention should be drawn to the fact that the Protocol on Amendments to the Protocol on the Statute of the African Court of Justice and Human Rights, establishing an International Criminal Law Section in the Court, includes corruption and money-laundering among the crimes covered by that Section.[112]

B. National legislative practice

42. Immunity of the State or of its officials from jurisdiction is not explicitly regulated in most States. On the contrary, the response to immunity has been left to the courts and, when they did address the issue, the courts have usually done so by applying what they consider to be rules of international law referred to in their judgments and other decisions. Various legal grounds have been invoked for this application of the rules of international law: reference to the general principles of law governing the relationship between international law and national law; application of the intrinsic principles of common law;[113] or application of provisions

[111] Explanatory Report, para. 77, p. 16.

[112] See new art. 28A, paras. 8 and 9, of the Statute of the African Court.

[113] This is the case, in particular, in the United States on the basis of the Samantar judgment, which established the inapplicability of the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act to State officials considered individually and stated that their immunity is subject to the rules of common law. See Chimène I. Keitner: "The common law of foreign official immunity", Green Bag, vol. 14 2D, of a general nature determining the powers of domestic judicial organs and referring to applicable international law to settle instances in which immunity may be an issue.[114]

43. This report does not analyse the national norms that simply refer to applicable international law, since they do nothing to shed light on the nature of the limitations and exceptions to immunity, which will necessarily be those established in the international order. There will, however, be an analysis of the practice of the domestic courts responsible for applying those norms, since their decisions show what they understand by "applicable international law". This section analyses the national laws expressly governing immunity and those other laws which, in regulating the jurisdiction of the State as regards international crimes, refer to immunity.

44. Starting with the first category, attention should first be drawn to the fact that national laws regulating jurisdictional immunity are very few in number and, in addition, usually refer basically to immunities of the State. However, some laws contain provisions allowing them to be applied to certain State officials, especially the Head of State. These include legislation of the United States (Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act, 1976),[115] the United Kingdom (State Immunity Act, 1978),[116] Singapore (State Immunity Act, 1979), Pakistan (State Immunity Ordinance, 1981),[117] South Africa (Foreign States Immunities Act, 1981), Australia (Foreign States Immunities Act, 1985),[118] Canada (State Immunity Act, 1985),[119] Argentina (Jurisdictional Immunity of Foreign States in Argentine Courts Act, 1995),[120] Japan (Civil Jurisdiction of Japan with respect to a Foreign State Act, 2009)[121] and Spain (Privileges and Immunities of Foreign States, International Organizations with

[114] Among these norms providing for general reference to international law, mention may be made of the following examples: Belgium: Repression of Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Act, amended by Act of 23 April 2003, art. 4.3; Germany, Courts Constitution Act, art. 20.2; Kyrgyzstan: Criminal Procedure Code, 1999, art. 16.2; Montenegro, Criminal Procedure Code, 2010, art. 252.1; Netherlands: Penal Code, art. 8; Philippines: Crimes against International Humanitarian Law, Genocide and other Crimes against Humanity Act, No. 9851, of 27 July 2009, sect. 9 (b); Russian Federation: Penal Code, 13 July 1996, art. 11.4; Spain: Organic Act 6/1985 on the Judiciary, amended by Organic Act 16/2015, art. 23.4; Uzbekistan: Criminal Procedure Code art. 4. This reference to the applicable norms of international law has created quite a few problems for domestic courts in cases concerning immunity, which is why some States have enacted domestic laws on the subject. For example, after following a system of reference to international law for over 30 years, Spain opted to supplement that system in 2015 with an Immunities Act.

[115] The United States legislation was amended in 1991 by the Torture Victim Protection Act of 1991. See sects. 1605 and 1605A of the U.S. Code.

Headquarters or Offices in Spain and International Conferences and Meetings held in Spain Organic Act, 2015).[122]

45. Most of these laws refer to exceptions and limitations to immunities of the State in two different ways: (a) a "territorial tort exception" in the case of damage to persons or property occurring in the forum State;[123] and (b) exceptions to certain categories of proceedings concerning claims connected with rights and obligations that may be classified in the category of jus gestionis acts, anticipating or applying the provisions of the 2004 Convention.[124] On the other hand, it is noteworthy that, although all the laws mentioned apply generically to the State, only some of them refer to State officials, mentioning only the Head of State or the representatives of the State acting "in their public capacity"[125] and thus limiting their applicability to such officials ratione materiae. Only the Spanish Act of 2015 deals with the immunity of certain officials (Head of State, Head of Government and Minister for Foreign Affairs) from the perspective of both immunity ratione personae and immunity ratione materiae.[126] Lastly, it should be noted that, because of their content, the cited laws generally regulate exceptions in such a way that they are only indirectly relevant to criminal jurisdictions. In addition, some of the laws in question expressly bar their application to criminal proceedings.[127]

46. Only three laws on immunity contain provisions referring to another type of exception more germane to the subject under consideration. These are the United States Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act, the Canadian State Immunity Act and the Spanish Organic Act 16/2015. The Argentine Act 24.488 should also be considered, although it does not expressly mention any exception related to criminal issues.

[123] See the following laws: Argentina, art. 2 (e); Australia, sects. 13 and 42 (2); Canada, sect. 6; Japan (art. 10; Singapore, sect. 7; South Africa, sect. 6; Spain, art. 11; United Kingdom, sect. 5; United States, sect. 1605 (a) (5) (for convenience, the laws are cited by reference to the adopting State).

[124] These exceptions refer to the following acts: commercial transactions, labour contracts, rights concerning ownership and possession of assets, intellectual and industrial property, membership and participation in legal entities and corporate bodies, submission to commercial arbitration, acts and rights relating to State-owned vessels used for commercial purposes, obligations concerning payment of taxes and charges, rights and obligations derived from shares. See the following laws: Argentina, art. 2 (c), (d), (f), (g) and (h); Australia, sects. 11, 12, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19 and 20; Canada, sects. 5, 7 and 8; Spain, arts. 9, 10 and 12-16; United States, sect. 1605 (a) (2)-(4) and (6) (b) and (d); Japan, arts. 8, 9 and 11-16; Pakistan, sects. 5-12; United Kingdom, sections 3, 4 and 6-11; Singapore, sects. 5 and 6-13; and South Africa, sects. 4, 5 and 7-12.

[125] The following laws refer in a general way to the Head of State: Australia, sects. 3.1, 3.3 (a) and 36; Canada, sect. 2 (a); Pakistan, sect. 15; Singapore, sect. 16 (1) (a); South Africa, sect. 1 (2) (a); and United Kingdom, sect. 14 (a). There are references to "representatives of the State when acting in that capacity" in the laws of Spain, art. 2 (c) (iv), and Japan, art. 2 (iv). United States courts originally considered that State officials acting in an official capacity were covered by the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act. However, since the judgment in the Samantar case, such immunity is exclusively governed by the norms of common law. On this question, see document A/CN.4/686, para. 106.

[126] Organic Act 16/2015 applies both to immunities of "foreign States and their property" (art. 1 (a)) and to immunities of "Heads of State and Government and Ministers for Foreign Affairs during the exercise and upon the completion of their functions" (art. 1 (b)). Title II of Organic Act 16/2015 is devoted entirely to "privileges and immunities of the Head of State, the Head of Government and the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the foreign State". See also art. 22, para. 2.

[127] See the following laws: Canada, sect. 18; Japan, art. 1; Singapore, sect. 19 (2) (b); and South Africa, sect. 2 (3). The United States law also is not applicable to criminal jurisdiction.

47. Although the United States Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act originally used the general version of exceptions described supra, it was amended by the Torture Victim Protection Act, which added a section 1605A, entitled "Terrorism exception to the jurisdictional immunity of a foreign State", which provides as follows:

> "A foreign state shall not be immune from the jurisdiction of courts of the United States or of the States in any case not otherwise covered by this chapter in which money damages are sought against a foreign state for personal injury or death that was caused by an act of torture, extrajudicial killing, aircraft sabotage, hostage taking, or the provision of material support or resources for such an act if such act or provision of material support or resources is engaged in by an official, employee, or agent of such foreign state while acting within the scope of his or her office, employment, or agency";[128]

providing that the following conditions are met:[129]

(a) The foreign State was designated by the Secretary of State as a "State sponsor of terrorism";

(b) The claimant or the victim was a national of the United States, a member of its armed forces or an employee of the Government;

(c) In a case in which the act occurred in the territory of the State against which the claim has been brought, the claimant has afforded the foreign State a reasonable opportunity to arbitrate the claim in accordance with the accepted international rules of arbitration.

48. This exception allowed United States courts to deny a foreign State immunity from jurisdiction in a number of cases that have been confirmed in civil jurisdiction[130] in relation to acts that are unmistakably international crimes. However, it should also be noted that the exception in question is not general in scope and applies only in relation to acts performed by States formally designated by the Secretary of State as sponsors of terrorism, thus making the exception a matter of political discretion.

49. Canada's State Immunity Act was amended in 2012 to add an exception entitled "Support of terrorism", which is included in the section devoted to damage and injury. Under the Act, a State included on the terrorism support list will not be immune from the jurisdiction of Canadian courts as regards proceedings brought against it for support for terrorism or for terrorist activities.[131] The presentation of this exception is very similar to that of United States law, so that the observations in the preceding paragraph also apply to it.

50. Organic Act 16/2015, recently adopted in Spain, has introduced a somewhat different version of the regime applicable to exceptions. As already noted supra, this Act distinguishes between the regime applicable to immunity of the State and the regime applicable to Heads of State, Heads of Government and Ministers for Foreign Affairs, both as regards immunity ratione personae[132] and as regards immunity ratione materiae.[133] In the latter case, it introduces an exception based on international crimes, establishing that even for "acts performed during a term in office in exercise of official functions (…) crimes of genocide, forced disappearance, war and crimes against humanity will be excluded from immunity".[134] This is a general exception which does not impose any additional conditions, but it is applicable exclusively in the framework of immunity ratione materiae.

51. This exception is supplemented by a provision of general scope, under the heading "International crimes", which establishes the following:

> "The provisions of this Title shall not affect the international obligations assumed by Spain regarding the prosecution of international crimes, or its commitments to the International Criminal Court".[135]

This provision has a different significance from the exception previously mentioned, since it applies both to immunity ratione materiae and to immunity ratione personae. However, its scope is more limited, since it concerns only instances in which Spain is required by an international norm to prosecute a person for the commission of international crimes and measures to be taken by Spanish courts to respond to a request for cooperation from the International Criminal Court.[136]

52. Lastly, Act 24 488 adopted by the Congress of Argentina contained the following article 3:

> "If a complaint is made to Argentine courts against a foreign State, claiming a violation of international human rights law, the court concerned shall simply indicate to the complainant which organ of international protection in the regional or universal sphere would be competent to hear the complaint, if appropriate. In addition, it shall transmit a copy of the complaint to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, International Trade and Worship so that it can be informed of the request and can take any appropriate measures in the international order".

53. However, this article was deleted ("observed") when the Act was promulgated by Decree 849/95 and is therefore not part of it.[137] The argument put forward in the Decree concerning the deletion of article 3 is of interest in connection with the analysis of exceptions, for two main reasons: (a) it states that violations of human rights generally constitute acts performed in the exercise of authority (acta jure imperii)";[138] and (b) it notes that the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment

[135] Art. 29.

[136] This exception was included at the request of the General Council of the Judiciary and the Public Prosecutor's Council (the organs responsible for judges and prosecutors) in order to ensure that, despite recognizing the relevant immunities, Spain can fulfil its international obligations derived from norms of international criminal law and especially that it can comply with requests for cooperation addressed to it by international criminal tribunals. It is important to realize that this provision must be read in the light of the sixth final provision of the Organic Act to the effect that "in the event of a normative conflict between the present Organic Act and the provisions of an international treaty to which the Kingdom of Spain is a party, preference shall be given to the international treaty".

[137] See art. 1 of the above-mentioned Decree. Decree 849/95 of 22 June 1995, adopted by the Council of Government, can be consulted at infoleg.mecon.gov.ar.

[138] See the second preambular paragraph of the Decree.

of the Crime of Genocide and the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (which have constitutional status in Argentina) refer to "crimes that may give rise to civil liability" and that it "seems inappropriate to deny access to justice in order to require compliance with that requirement".[139] Consequently, although Act No. 24.488 does not contain an explicit exception concerning international crimes, its interpretation in the light of Decree No. 849/95, ordering its partial promulgation, leads to the conclusion that Argentine courts will be competent to hear complaints against a foreign State for violation of international human rights law.

54. Among the domestic laws regulating international crimes, mention should first be made of the Repression of Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Act, adopted in Belgium in 1993 and amended in 1999 and 2003. The Act had an interesting history, largely relating to the Arrest Warrant case of 11 April 2000.[140] The 1999 version stated that "immunity connected with the official status of a person shall not prevent the application of the (…) law", but following the 2003 amendment that statement was modified by the phrase "within the limitations established by international law".[141] Moreover, article 13 of the Act circumscribes this rule still further by stating that:

> "In accordance with international law, exercise of jurisdiction is excluded in relation to: (i) Heads of State, Heads of Government and Ministers for Foreign Affairs, during the period when they are performing their functions, as well as to other persons with immunity recognized in international law; (ii) persons enjoying total or partial immunity under a treaty binding on Belgium."

Consequently, Belgian law recognizes absolute immunity ratione personae but does not address immunity ratione materiae and this has been interpreted as implicit recognition of the possibility of applying exceptions to it in connection with crimes against humanity, war and genocide.

55. In the Netherlands, the 2003 International Crimes Act uses a similar wording, establishing in its section 16 that "[c]riminal prosecution for one of the crimes referred to in this Act is excluded with respect to: (a) foreign Heads of State, Heads of Government and Ministers for Foreign Affairs, as long as they are in office, and other persons in so far as their immunity is recognized under customary international law; (b) persons who have immunity under any convention applicable within the Kingdom of the Netherlands". Consequently, the Netherlands legislation recognizes the immunity of the "troika" members when they are in office, including with regard to international crimes. However, after their term in office has ended, immunity would apply to them only in respect of acts performed in an official capacity and this, according to information provided by the Netherlands Government, would not cover international crimes.[142]

56. The opposite approach is followed in the Penal Code of the Republic of the Niger, amended in 2003, which explicitly states that "immunity linked to the official status of a person does not exempt him or her from [criminal] prosecution for war crimes or crimes against humanity".[143]

57. Lastly, the question of immunity has been regulated in various laws designed to incorporate and develop in domestic legislation the provisions contained in the Rome Statute, both from a substantive viewpoint and from the viewpoint of competence and procedure. These are what are referred to as "implementing laws", which are undeniably of interest for the purposes of the present report. These "implementing laws" have addressed the question of limitations and exceptions to immunity from two different perspectives: (a) definition of a general system of exclusion from immunity; and (b) definition of a system of exclusion from immunity solely in relation to the general obligation of States parties to cooperate with the International Criminal Court.

58. The first approach is typified by the laws adopted in Burkina Faso, the Comoros, Ireland, Mauritius and South Africa.[144] Under these laws, domestic law recognizes that in general no immunity can be invoked against to the exercise of national criminal jurisdiction regarding crimes within the competence of the International Criminal Court, especially crimes of genocide, crimes against humanity and war crimes.

59. The second approach circumscribes the question of application of immunity to those cases in which national criminal jurisdiction must be exercised in order to ensure some form of cooperation with the Court, especially as regards arrest and surrender of persons to the Court. This second approach is illustrated by laws adopted in Canada, France, Germany, Kenya, New Zealand, Norway, Switzerland and Uganda, which do not take into consideration immunity or relevance of official status as grounds for non-compliance with the order to surrender.[145] The laws

In addition, official status will not be grounds for exception or reduction of responsibility); Comoros, Act No. 11-022 of 13 December 2011 concerning the application of the Rome Statute, art. 7.2 ("the immunities or special rules of procedure accompanying the official status of a person by virtue of the law or of international law shall not prevent national courts from exercising their competence with regard to that person in relation to the offences specified in this Act"); Ireland: International Criminal Court Act 2006, art. 61.1 ("In accordance with article 27, any diplomatic immunity or state immunity attaching to a person by reason of a connection with a state party to the Statute is not a bar to proceedings under this Act in relation to the person."; Mauritius: International Criminal Court Act 2001, art. 4; South Africa: Act No. 27 of 18 July 2002 implementing the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, art. 4 (2) (a) (i) and 4 (3) (c) stating that South African courts are competent to prosecute crimes of genocide, crimes against humanity and war crimes when the presumed perpetrator is in South Africa and that any official status claimed by the accused is irrelevant. This exemption from immunity is, in addition, effective "despite any other law to the contrary, including customary and conventional international law". The Supreme Court of South Africa ruled on this question on 15 March 2016 in connection with the unsuccessful arrest warrant for President Al-Bashir.

[145] See Canada: 1999 Extradition Act, art, 18; France: Code of Criminal Procedure (under Act No. 2002-268 of 26 February 2002), art. 627.8; Germany: Courts Constitution Act, arts. 20.1 and 21; adopted in Iceland, Ireland, Malta, Samoa and the United Kingdom deal only with the irrelevance of immunity and of official status in relation to nationals of States parties to the Rome Statute, establishing a system of consultations with the Court in the case of nationals of States not parties.[146] Lastly, the laws adopted in Argentina, Australia, Austria and Liechtenstein do not provide for non-applicability of immunity in all cases, using systems of consultation with the Court in order to resolve any dispute that may arise as a result of the combined application of articles 27 and 98, paragraph 1, of the Rome Statute.[147] In any case, the non-applicability of immunity for the purpose of ensuring cooperation with the Court is also mentioned in some of the implementing laws following the first approach, as in the case of Burkina Faso and South Africa.[148]

C. International judicial practice

60. The question of limitations and exceptions to immunity from foreign criminal jurisdiction has been considered in various judgments of the International Court of Justice, the European Court of Human Rights, the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia, the Special Court for Sierra Leone and the International Criminal Court.

1. International Court of Justice

61. In the Arrest Warrant case, the International Court of Justice was categorical as to the full nature of the immunity from foreign criminal jurisdiction enjoyed by the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Democratic Republic of the Congo:

> "Throughout the duration of his or her office, [the Minister for Foreign Affairs] when abroad enjoys full immunity from criminal jurisdiction and inviolability."[149]

Such immunity is based on the functions performed by the Minister for Foreign Affairs in international relations. To protect those functions, the immunity covers all acts performed by the Minister, both in an official capacity and in a private Denmark is a special case: its Act of 16 May 2001 on the International Criminal Court (art. 2) notes the decision to settle questions on executive immunity without defining a specific system for consultations.

capacity.[150] The Court also concluded that it was unable to determine the existence of an exception to such immunity in contemporary international law, not even in cases where the acts in question constitute war crimes or crimes against humanity. According to the Court, such exception cannot be deduced from State practice[151] or from the instruments creating international criminal courts or tribunals.[152]

62. Nonetheless, the Court attempted to safeguard the principle of individual criminal responsibility enshrined in contemporary international law, which, in its view, is not affected by immunity from criminal jurisdiction. The Court used two complementary arguments to that end, namely the distinction between immunity and jurisdiction, on the one hand, and the distinction between immunity and impunity, on the other.

63. With regard to the first argument, the Court said that "jurisdiction does not imply absence of immunity, while absence of immunity does not imply jurisdiction", and that even in cases where certain conventions have imposed on States the obligation to prosecute or extradite a person for international crimes, such extension of jurisdiction "in no way affects immunities under customary international law, including those of Ministers for Foreign Affairs", which "remain opposable before the courts of a foreign State".[153]

64. The argument concerning the distinction between immunity and impunity is of greater interest for the purposes of the present report. In that connection, the Court noted that

> "The immunity from jurisdiction enjoyed by incumbent Ministers for Foreign Affairs does not mean that they enjoy impunity in respect of any crimes they might have committed, irrespective of their gravity. Immunity from criminal jurisdiction and individual criminal responsibility are quite separate concepts. While jurisdictional immunity is procedural in nature, criminal responsibility is a question of substantive law. Jurisdictional immunity may well bar prosecution for a certain period or for certain offences; it cannot exonerate the person to whom it applies from all criminal responsibility."[154]

65. To reinforce the argument, the Court pointed to the existence of an alternative model for deducing an individual's criminal responsibility, which it described as follows:

[150] Ibid. For a description of said functions, see ibid., pp. 21-22, para. 53. The Court was especially clear in describing the functional dimension of that immunity: "[f]urthermore, even the mere risk that, by travelling to or transiting another State a Minister for Foreign Affairs might be exposing himself or herself to legal proceedings could deter the Minister from travelling internationally when required to do so for the purposes of the performance of his or her official functions" (ibid., p. 22, para. 55).

[151] After examining the relevant national laws and a few decisions of national higher courts, the Court stated that it had been unable to deduce "that there exists under customary international law any form of exception to the rule according immunity from criminal jurisdiction and inviolability to incumbent Ministers for Foreign Affairs, where they are suspected of having committed war crimes or crimes against humanity" (ibid., p. 24, para. 58, first subparagraph.

[154] Ibid., p. 25, para. 60.

> "First, such persons enjoy no criminal immunity under international law in their own countries, and may thus be tried by those countries' courts in accordance with the relevant rules of domestic law.
>
> Secondly, they will cease to enjoy immunity from foreign jurisdiction if the State which they represent or have represented decides to waive that immunity.
>
> Thirdly, after a person ceases to hold the office of Minister for Foreign Affairs, he or she will no longer enjoy all of the immunities accorded by international law in other States. Provided that it has jurisdiction under international law, a court of one State may try a former Minister for Foreign Affairs of another State in respect of acts committed prior or subsequent to his or her period of office, as well as in respect of acts committed during that period of office in a private capacity.
> Fourthly, an incumbent or former Minister for Foreign Affairs may be subject to criminal proceedings before certain international criminal courts, where they have jurisdiction."[155]

66. With these arguments, the Court set out a model of immunity from foreign criminal jurisdiction of Ministers for Foreign Affairs which has become the benchmark, revolving around four basic ideas:

(a) All acts performed by the Minister for Foreign Affairs during his or her time in office are covered by absolute immunity;

(b) There are no exceptions to such immunity;

(c) Immunity is a "procedural bar" to the exercise of jurisdiction and not a substantive bar to the deduction of international criminal responsibility, including for acts which might constitute international crimes;

(d) Individual criminal responsibility is safeguarded by recourse to other means of redress distinct from the exercise of foreign criminal jurisdiction.

67. In any event, it should be noted that even though the judgment in the Arrest Warrant case is usually cited as a benchmark for the regime of immunity from foreign criminal jurisdiction for all State officials, the Court's conclusions on this matter have limited scope. For instance, as the Court itself noted in the judgment that, "[f]or the purposes of [the said] case, (…) it is only the immunity from criminal jurisdiction and the inviolability of an incumbent Minister for Foreign Affairs that fall for the Court to consider",[156] but did not go any further. The Court's response therefore falls within the scope of immunity ratione personae, since it is not possible to conclude that said model should apply automatically to other State officials, who the Court seems to admit fall under a different legal regime. In any event, the Court's view on the topic under consideration is conclusive: there are no exceptions to immunity from international criminal jurisdiction for a Minister for Foreign Affairs (and, by extension, to immunity ratione personae), not even in respect of such grave crimes as war crimes and crimes against humanity.

68. Although the judgment was approved by a large majority, it must be remembered that various judges took a more nuanced view of the limitations and exceptions to immunity, and even dissented from the judgment. In that connection, although Judges Higgins, Kooijmans and Buergenthal supported the Court's position that there are no exceptions that could apply to immunity in the case under consideration, they drew attention to the increasing claim in the literature "that serious international crimes cannot be regarded as official acts because they are neither normal State functions nor functions that a State alone (in contrast to an individual) can perform".[157] They also pointed to the need for a balanced interpretation of immunity that takes into account the need to protect the principle of sovereign equality and the requirements of international relations, on the one hand, and the need to ensure that said principle does not impede the combating of impunity, on the other. In that regard, they noted the increasing recognition that the notion that "perpetrators of serious international crimes do not go unpunished has had its impact on the immunities which high State dignitaries enjoyed under traditional customary law".[158] For the three judges, immunity is never substantive; it "[h]as given rise to a tendency, in the case of international crimes, to grant procedural immunity from jurisdiction only for as long as the suspected State official is in office".[159] It should be noted that the three judges also expressed doubts as to the viability of the alternative means of redress which the Court referred to in its judgment.[160]

69. The position taken by Judge Al-Khasawneh in his dissenting opinion is more convincing. In his view, the immunity from international criminal jurisdiction of the Minister for Foreign Affairs must remain limited to acts performed in an official capacity and, even more importantly for the purposes of the present report, can under no circumstances apply to war crimes, crimes against humanity and genocide. For him, it does not appear reasonable to admit that State immunity has been gradually restricted to exclude acts that are of a commercial or jure gestiones nature. Nonetheless, the immunity of the Minister for Foreign Affairs should be maintained where he or she commits an international crime, especially at a time when the combating of grave crimes has assumed a jus cogens character.[161]

70. Lastly, Judge ad hoc Van den Wyngaert not only denied that Ministers for Foreign Affairs enjoy immunity ratione personae, but also introduced new elements in her argument, which could be summarized as follows: (a) extending immunity ratione personae to the Minister for Foreign Affairs "would dramatically increase the number of persons enjoying international immunity from jurisdiction. There would be a potential for abuse. Male fide Governments could appoint suspects of serious human rights violations to cabinet posts in order to shelter them from prosecution in third States",[162] and "[v]ictims of such violations bringing legal action against such persons in third States would face the obstacle of immunity from jurisdiction (…) and may even lead to conflict with international human rights rules";[163] (b) there is a "general tendency toward the restriction of immunity of the State officials (including even Heads of State), not only in the field of private and commercial law where the par in parem principle has become more and more restricted and deprived of its mystique, but also in the field of criminal law, when there are allegations of serious international crimes";[164] and (iii) the alternative model which, according to the judgment, would help to reduce the individual criminal responsibility of a Minister for Foreign Affairs for international crimes, is not consonant with the reality of our international practice nor with the limited nature of the jurisdictions of international criminal courts.[165]

71. In Certain Questions of Mutual Assistance in Criminal Matters, the ICJ also made reference to the limitations and exceptions to immunity, reiterating what it had said in the Arrest Warrant case:

> "A Head of State enjoys in particular 'full immunity from criminal jurisdiction and inviolability' which protects him or her 'against any act of authority of another State which would hinder him or her in the performance of his or her duties.'"[166]

In any event, that assertion was made solely in relation to the immunity ratione personae that would be enjoyed by the President of Djibouti. Conversely, by not addressing the immunity claimed by the Procureur de la République and the Head of National Security, the judgment failed to provide conclusive reference as to the limitations and exceptions that could have been alleged in both cases.

72. Lastly, in Questions Relating to the Obligation to Prosecute or Extradite, the Court also did not pronounce on the question of immunities, since Chad had communicated to the Court that it had waived the immunity of Mr. Hissène Habré.[167] However, for the purposes of the present report, it is worth noting that the Court stressed in its judgment that "the prohibition of torture is part of customary international law and it has become a peremptory norm (jus cogens)".[168] It is also important to note that, for the Court, the oversight system established by the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment is intended "(…) to prevent alleged perpetrators of acts of torture from going unpunished, by ensuring that they cannot find refuge in any State party".[169] In so doing, the Court introduced the argument that the combating of impunity is one of the objectives pursued by the international community.[170]

However, that topic was not before the Court.

[168] Ibid., p. 457, para. 99. Some of the judges maintained that stance on the prohibition of torture in their separate or dissenting opinions. In her dissenting opinion, for example, Judge Xue expressly identified "the prohibition of torture as jus cogens" p. 575, para. 17), by concluding that "jus cogens, by its very nature, does not automatically trump the applicability of these procedural rules" (ibid.).

[169] Ibid., p. 461, para. 120.

[170] In their separate or dissenting opinions, some of the judges also referred to the fight against impunity and the role that the Convention against Torture plays to that end. In that connection, see the opinions of Judges Cançado Trindade (ibid., p. 519, para. 83 and p. 527, para. 103) and Donoghue (ibid., p. 584, para. 2).

73. While in the judgments analysed above the Court addressed the basis on which a State could claim to exercise jurisdiction against an individual (State official), the issue raised in Jurisdictional Immunities of the State is different. In that case, what was before the Court was not the immunity of a high-ranking official, but the immunity of the State in a narrow sense. Nonetheless, some of the issues addressed in that case are of considerable interest for the institution of immunity, in abstract terms, especially the procedural nature of immunity, the relationship between immunity and the exercise of jurisdiction, and the relationship between immunity and responsibility. On the other hand, the Court did address two possible exceptions to immunity: the "territorial tort exception" and the exception based on the violation of jus cogens norms, both in close reference to war crimes and crimes against humanity committed by the Nazi occupying forces in Italian and Greek territories during the Second World War.

74. Given its complex content, it is not surprising that the judgment has given rise to a fascinating academic debate.[171] On the other hand, it should be borne in mind that, owing to that same content, the judgment has also been cited as a reference in identifying the rules pertaining to the regime of immunity in a broad sense. For the purposes of the present report, an analysis of the judgment in Jurisdictional Immunities of the State would therefore be useful, in particular with regard to the following aspects: the nature of immunity and its relationship with jurisdiction and the regime of the international responsibility of the State; the effects of jus cogens norms on immunity; the scope of the "territorial tort exception", and the question concerning the existence of alternative means of redress.

75. In that judgment, the Court, in line with its previous rulings, put emphasis on the clearly procedural nature of immunity, which does not affect the definition of State responsibility, but only the possibility of such responsibility deriving from the exercise of foreign jurisdiction. In that connection, it stated expressly that:

> "The law of immunity is essentially procedural in nature (…). It regulates the exercise of jurisdiction in respect of particular conduct and is thus entirely distinct from the substantive law which determines whether that conduct is lawful or unlawful."[172]

76. The basis for immunity, according to that view, is the principle of the sovereign equality of States. However, that principle does not operate autonomously; the Court stated that said principle:

> "has to be viewed together with the principle that each State possesses sovereignty over its own territory and that there flows from that sovereignty the jurisdiction of the State over events and persons within that territory."

77. The Court therefore recognizes the need to balance competing principles, having stated that:

> "Exceptions to the immunity of the State represent a departure from the principle of sovereign equality. Immunity may represent a departure from the principle of territorial sovereignty and the jurisdiction which flows from it."[173]

78. The Court also used the argument that immunity is a procedural bar to conclude that it does not conflict with the rules of jus cogens:

> "Assuming (...) that the rules of the law of armed conflict which prohibit the murder of civilians in occupied territory, the deportation of civilian inhabitants to slave labour and the deportation of prisoners of war to slave labour are rules of jus cogens, there is no conflict between those rules and the rules on State immunity. The two sets of rules address different matters. The rules of State immunity are procedural in character and are confined to determining whether or not the courts of one State may exercise jurisdiction in respect of another State. They do not bear upon the question whether or not the conduct in respect of which the proceedings are brought was lawful or unlawful (...) For the same reason, recognizing the immunity of a foreign State in accordance with customary international law does not amount to recognizing as lawful a situation created by the breach of a jus cogens rule, or rendering aid and assistance in maintaining that situation, and so cannot contravene the principle in Article 41 of the International Law Commission's Articles on State Responsibility."[174]

The Court later added:

> "A jus cogens rule is one from which no derogation is permitted but the rules which determine the scope and extent of jurisdiction and when that jurisdiction may be exercised do not derogate from those substantive rules which possess jus cogens status, nor is there anything inherent in the concept of jus cogens which would require their modification or would displace their application."[175]

79. The third relevant topic addressed by the Court in that case is the question of whether there is any rule of customary international law that implies the existence of an exception to State immunity based on a serious violation of human rights or international humanitarian law. The Court's answer is that there is not. It stated that:

> "customary international law does not treat a State's entitlement to immunity as dependent upon the gravity of the act of which it is accused or the peremptory nature of the rule which it is alleged to have violated."[176]

80. Still with regard to exceptions, the Court also rejected the argument that the "territorial tort principle" is applicable to the case at hand. However, it should be noted that the Court's response concerning that exception is more nuanced than its comments on a potential exception based on the violation of jus cogens rules. It did not deny the existence of that exception or of a certain amount of practice in that respect, but simply stated that it was not applicable to the case at hand because the acts imputable to Germany, despite their gravity, constitute acta jure imperii and, as such, are covered by the jurisdictional immunities of the State.[177]

81. In the same judgment, the Court also ruled on the contention by Italy that the exercise of jurisdiction is a "last resort" in view of the impossibility of satisfying the claims of the victims for redress for the harm suffered. The Court concluded that immunity is not dependent upon whether or not there exists a right to redress or alternative means of securing redress.[178]

82. In summary, in that judgment the Court, in line with its previous rulings, maintained its view of immunity as a merely procedural institution. However, it went a step further in strengthening State immunity by concluding that its existence is not in conflict with the rules of jus cogens, that no exceptions to such immunity based on a serious violation of human rights, international humanitarian law or other rules of jus cogens can be identified, and that the "territorial tort exception" does not apply in the case of State immunity for acta jure imperii. Lastly, the Court could also be considered to be moving away from the model of alternative means of redress as a way of preventing impunity that it established in its judgment in Arrest Warrant.

83. On first reading, the Court's position could, a priori, appear to have a bearing on the immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction. The inverted parallelism that the Court itself seems to establish between the Jurisdictional Immunities of the State and Arrest Warrant cases has no doubt contributed to such an understanding:

> "In Arrest Warrant, the Court held, albeit without express reference to the concept of jus cogens, that the fact that a Minister for Foreign Affairs was accused of criminal violations of rules which undoubtedly possess the character of jus cogens did not deprive the Democratic Republic of the Congo of the entitlement which it possessed as a matter of customary international law to demand immunity on his behalf (...) [T]he same reasoning is applicable to the application of the customary international law regarding the immunity of one State from proceedings in the courts of another."[179]

84. The fact that the Court brought national case law, which at times pertains more to State officials than to the State itself, into its argument may also have contributed to such a reading. It is therefore unsurprising that this judgment is sometimes used to argue that there are no limitations or exceptions to the immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction based on the violation of human rights or international humanitarian law or the commission of international crimes.[180]

85. However, it should be noted that the Court itself clearly set out the scope of the judgment: State immunity stricto sensu. Suffice it to note that the Court stated that Pinochet is not relevant to Jurisdictional Immunities of the State because Pinochet relates to the immunity of an individual rather than that of the State, and immunity from criminal jurisdiction rather than immunity from civil jurisdiction.[181] The Court thus seems to establish a clear distinction between State immunity and the immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction. That conclusion is even more evident in the following unambiguous statement by the Court:

> "The Court concludes that, under customary international law as it presently stands, a State is not deprived of immunity by reason of the fact that it is accused of serious violations of international human rights law or the international law of armed conflict. In reaching that conclusion, the Court must emphasize that it is addressing only the immunity of the State itself from the jurisdiction of the courts of other States; the question of whether, and if so to what extent, immunity might apply in criminal proceedings against an official of the State is not in issue in the present case."[182]

86. It is not the purpose of this report to analyse the Court's reasoning in its judgment in Jurisdictional Immunities of the State. However, while some of the Court's arguments in that judgment may have an abstract value to contribute to the definition of the immunities regime under international law, it should be noted that the conclusions reached in that case cannot automatically be transposed to the regime of limitations and exceptions to the immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction.

2. European Court of Human Rights

87. The European Court of Human Rights pronounced on questions that are relevant for the consideration of limitations and exceptions to immunity in its judgments in the cases of Al-Adsani v. United Kingdom,[183] McElhinney v. Ireland,[184] Kalogeropoulou and others v. Greece and Germany,[185] and Jones and others v. United Kingdom.[186]

88. In all those cases, the Court concluded that the application of State immunity in civil court did not constitute a violation of the right of access to a court per se, as embodied in article 6, paragraph 1 of the European Convention on Human Rights. According to the Court,[187] restrictions to the right of access to a court may be permissible, provided they meet the following requirements: (a) that they are provided for in law; (b) that there is a relationship of proportionality between the interests to be protected by the restriction and limitations to the right that may arise therefrom; and (c) that the restriction does not in fact imply an absolute loss of the right of access to a court.[188] In the Court's view, the rule relating to State immunity will satisfy the three requirements, in that it is a recognized norm of customary international law which pursues a legitimate aim, namely to protect the principle of sovereign equality and maintain stable, conflict-free relations between States, and does not entail the complete loss of the right of access to a court, given that alternative means of redress are available to applicants, including judicial action (action before the courts of another State), diplomatic action and international negotiation through the victim's State of nationality.[189]

89. It must be borne in mind that this declaration of compatibility between immunity from jurisdiction and the right of access to a court is defined by the Court in relation to State immunity from civil jurisdiction, with the sole exception being the case of Jones and others v. United Kingdom, where it pronounced on the immunity from civil jurisdiction of State officials, applying the same conclusions it had formulated previously in respect of State immunity.[190]

90. Secondly, the Court has also pronounced on possible exceptions to the rule of immunity, in particular with respect to torture and jus cogens norms, on the one hand, and the "territorial tort exception", on the other.

91. With regard to torture and jus cogens norms, the Court has concluded that, despite the inherent gravity of any conduct that constitutes a violation of a peremptory norm, and in particular the prohibition against torture, it is not possible to find in existing international law any norm that provides an exception to State immunity from civil jurisdiction based on a violation of a jus cogens norm.[191] It should also be noted that in Kalogeropoulou, the Court followed Al-Adsani in its conclusions without presenting any new arguments, adding that the applicant had alternative means of securing redress.[192] Lastly, with respect to Jones, it should be noted that even though the Court refused to modify its previous position, it used the uncertainty that exists in international law as to the regime of exceptions to justify its decision, to a certain extent. It referred, inter alia, to the fact that the International Law Commission is working on the topic without having taken a decision in that regard, and the fact that international practice is constantly changing and reflects divergent positions on a possible exception based on torture.[193] It is also worth noting that the Court cited the judgment of the International Court of Justice in Jurisdictional Immunities as precedent.[194] Nonetheless, the Court expressly acknowledged that there seems to be "some emerging support in favour of a special rule or exception in public international law in cases concerning civil claims for torture lodged against foreign State officials", and that, "in light of the developments currently underway in this area of public international law, this is a matter which needs to be kept under review by Contracting States".[195]

92. On the other hand, it should be borne in mind that a non-negligible number of members of the Court have disagreed with the assertion that such an exception does not exist, issuing dissenting opinions in Al-Adsani, Kalogeropoulou and Jones, in which they emphasized that, as a jus cogens norm, the prohibition of torture trumps any other norm of international law that does not fall into said category, including norms of international law governing immunity from civil jurisdiction. Such opinions carried considerable weight in Al-Adsani, considering the narrow majority (nine to eight) of the ruling.[196]

93. The Court addressed the "territorial tort exception" in McElhinney v. Ireland, where it concluded that there is no territorial tort exception in respect of the acts under dispute, namely the assault of an Irish national by a member of the United Kingdom armed forces in the territory of Ireland during incidents that occurred at the border between Northern Ireland and the Republic of Ireland. The Court applied a narrow interpretation of the territorial tort exception in reaching that conclusion, indicating that such exception applied only to "insurable injury" related to activities jure gestionis. Conversely, it maintained that the impugned acts were unequivocally acts performed in an official capacity — acts jus imperii — for which the United Kingdom was responsible, hence the deduction that it was the immunity from civil jurisdiction of the United Kingdom that was at issue.[197] On the other hand, the Court seems to have accorded great importance in its reasoning to the fact that the applicant had other means of redress, including by bringing an action in a court of the United Kingdom.[198]

94. Thirdly, special attention should be drawn to the fact that despite refusing to recognize the existence of an exception, the European Court concluded unequivocally that the prohibition of torture was a jus cogens norm and that said prohibition was of an absolute nature, permitting no exception to the obligation arising therefrom in the event of a violation of the prohibition against torture and not of any other right which might be related incidentally to the prohibition considered per se.[199] It should be noted, therefore, that in Al-Adsani, the Court did not define immunity from civil jurisdiction as an institution which prevents the exercise of jurisdiction by British courts to punish perpetrators of acts of torture, but as an institution which can be used to bar British courts from seeking compensation from a foreign State for torture carried out by British officials.[200] This argument undoubtedly deserves to be reaffirmed in the present report.

95. In any event, in the light of the concrete pronouncements of the Court in respect of exceptions to State immunity from civil jurisdiction in the cases analysed, it is possible to identify a number of elements that are relevant for the purpose of the present report:

[198] See para. 39. Some of the judges disputed that affirmation or considered that its existence was not relevant in the case under consideration, given that the acts were committed against an Irish national, in Ireland, which meant that the national should first seek redress in Irish territorial jurisdiction. See the dissenting opinion of Judge Rozakis, joint dissenting opinion of Judges Caflisch, Cabral Barreto and Vajić, and the dissenting opinion of Judge Loucaides.

[199] See Al-Adsani, para. 59.

[200] Ibid., paras. 40-41.

(i) State immunity from civil jurisdiction is considered an exception or limitation to the right of access to courts, and therefore an exception to the exercise of jurisdiction by the forum State.

(ii) Such restriction, although compatible with the right of access to justice, cannot give rise to a total loss of the right itself, the Court having introduced the formulation "other means of redress", which the International Court of Justice had used in the Arrest Warrant case.

(iii) Prohibition against torture is defined per se as a jus cogens norm; it is an absolute prohibition which does not permit any derogation whatsoever.

In addition, given that the European Court of Human Rights circumscribes, directly or implicitly, its pronouncements on State immunity from civil jurisdiction,[201] it does not seem possible to conclude that the judgments in question constitute a sufficient basis for confirming that the immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction is of an absolute nature, or that there are no exceptions to such immunity.

3. International criminal court or tribunals

96. Various international criminal courts or tribunals have addressed the immunity of State officials from jurisdiction in the performance of their duties. Although the decisions of those tribunals are in the context of international criminal jurisdiction, some of the arguments contained therein are relevant for the purposes of the present report, given that they address very broad questions or the manner in which the immunity of State officials from criminal jurisdiction operates in national criminal courts or tribunals.

97. The International Military Tribunal at Nürnberg had already indicated that the official duties of an accused or the fact that the accused was acting on orders could not be used to exempt the accused from responsibility, and that the crimes under its jurisdiction reflected legal obligations that international law imposed directly on individuals, who could not be exonerated from such responsibility or from legal proceedings on the basis of their connection with the State. The Commission took into account both the statute and the judgments of that Tribunal in the development of the Principles of International Law Recognized in the Charter of the Nürnberg Tribunal and in the Judgment of the Tribunal (Nürnberg Principles), which are analysed infra and which the Commission refers to constantly in its work on other topics, including the draft Code of Crimes against the Peace and Security of Mankind.[202] It is also worth remembering that the contributions of the Nürnberg Tribunal to the definition of the principle of individual criminal responsibility also mark a starting point in modern international criminal law. The decisions of international criminal courts or tribunals that have been performing the functions of that Tribunal since the end of the twentieth century are analysed below.

98. The International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia has pronounced on the relationship between the immunity enjoyed by State officials and international crimes, asserting that there is an exception to the norms governing immunity ratione materiae before both international criminal courts or tribunals and national courts. In the Blaškić case, for instance, it stated that the exception:

> "arise[s] from the norms of international criminal law prohibiting war crimes, crimes against humanity and genocide. Under these norms, those responsible for such crimes cannot invoke immunity from national or international jurisdiction even if they perpetrated such crimes while acting in their official capacity".[203]

99. The Tribunal has maintained the same position in other cases, including in relation to immunity ratione personae. It is worth noting, however, that in those cases the Tribunal seems to limit the exception to the exercise of its jurisdiction, without extending it to cases brought before domestic courts.[204] In addition, relying on the Statute of the Nürnberg Tribunal,[205] the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia formulated that exception in broad terms, indicating that:

> "it would be incorrect to suggest that such an immunity exists in international criminal courts".[206]

100. The Special Court for Sierra Leone has also held that immunity ratione personae cannot be invoked, as it did in the case of Taylor, which concerned charges for serious violations of international humanitarian law. In that decision, the Court did not base its assertion on the type of crime committed, but on the very nature of the Special Court, considered an international criminal court. In response to the claim that immunity ratione personae protected Mr. Taylor, the Appeals Chamber stated that immunity:

> "derives from the equality of sovereign States and therefore has no relevance to international criminal tribunals which are not organs of a State but derive their mandate from the international community".[207]

It therefore concluded that:

> "the sovereign equality of States does not prevent a Head of State from being prosecuted before an international criminal tribunal or court".[208]

101. The question of the immunity of State officials, in particular but not limited to immunity ratione personae, was also raised before the International Criminal Court in relation to the situations in Darfur-Sudan, Libya and Kenya. Many of the accused invoked their official status, and hence their immunity, but were not present (or were not present on a continuous basis) at trial. In other cases, especially in the case of Al-Bashir, the topic of immunity was raised in relation to the obligation to cooperate with the Court, as provided for in Part IX of the Rome Statute.

102. Although the disputes in all those cases stemmed from the execution of arrest warrants or subpoenas issued by the Court, they ultimately led to the issue of the scope of the Court's jurisdiction and whether or not the exercise of said jurisdiction could be subject to a "procedural bar". In all those cases, the Court concluded that neither immunity ratione personae nor immunity ratione materiae could be invoked.

103. With regard to the Darfur-Sudan situation, the International Criminal Court held that immunity could not be invoked in the cases of Al-Bashir (ratione personae) and Abdel Hussein (ratione materiae). In both cases, in issuing its arrest warrant, the Pre-Trial Chamber determined that the immunity of the accused State officials could not be invoked, based on article 27 of the Statute and on the powers of the Security Council to refer a case to the Court pursuant to article 13 (b) of the Statute. In a joint interpretation of both provisions, the Court concluded that the irrelevance of official duties and the inability to invoke national and international immunities applied fully in the cases of Darfur, whether said State was a party to the Rome Statute or not. The Court said that:

> "by referring the Darfur situation to the Court, pursuant to article 13 (b) of the Statute, the Security Council of the United Nations has also accepted that the investigation into the said situation, as well as any prosecution arising therefrom, will take place in accordance with the statutory framework provided for in the Statute, the Elements of Crimes and the Rules as a whole."[209]

104. The Court also confirmed its jurisdiction in purposive terms, relating to the key goal of combating impunity and ensuring that persons accused of committing serious crimes of concern to the international community as a whole are brought to justice.

105. The Court applied the same reasoning when it ruled on the obligation of the Democratic Republic of the Congo to cooperate by arresting and surrendering President Al-Bashir, concluding that Mr. Al-Bashir did not enjoy immunity under international law, because that immunity had been implicitly waived by the Security Council, which had also imposed on the Sudan a general obligation to cooperate with the Court.[210] The Court employed a similar argument in the cases of Muammar Gaddafi, Saif Al-Islam Gaddafi and Al-Senussi on the Libya situation.[211]

[209] See Omar Hassan Ahmad Al-Bashir, case ICC-02/05-01/09, Pre-Trial Chamber I, decision on the prosecution's application for a warrant of arrest, of 4 March 2009, para. 45. It is worth noting that the Court had previously declared that it was competent to hear the case of a person who is not a national of a State party but who had allegedly committed crimes under the Court's jurisdiction in the territory of a State not party to the Statute, on the basis of the decision taken by the Security Council pursuant to article 13 (b) of the Statute (ibid., paras. 41-43). For a similar approach, see Abdel Raheem Muhammad Hussein, case ICC-02/05-01/12, Pre-Trial Chamber, decision on the prosecution's application under article 58, of 1 March 2012, para. 8.

[210] See case ICC-02/05-01/09, Pre-Trial Chamber II, decision on the cooperation of the Democratic Republic of the Congo regarding Omar Al Bashir's arrest and surrender to the Court, of 9 April

106. By contrast, in the cases of Kenyatta and Ruto, on the Kenya situation, the Court did not refer expressly to said argument. In both cases, in response to a defence petition for excusal from trial of the accused, to allow them to adequately fulfil their duties as President and Vice-President of Kenya, the Court said that it could not take those circumstances into consideration because, as a consequence of the Second World War:

> "the norm of immunity was revised in favour of jurisdiction of international courts to try Heads of State and other senior public officials, for violation of international criminal law".[212]

In the view of the Court, the chief object of article 27 of the Rome Statute is the incorporation of that principle.[213]

107. A similar approach to the one taken in the cases of Kenyatta and Ruto can be found in cases which the Court had considered previously concerning the failure by Malawi and Chad to cooperate in the arrest of President Al-Bashir. The Court had noted in those cases that:

> "customary international law creates an exception to Head of State immunity when international courts seek a Head of State's arrest for the commission of international crimes".[214]

108. In short, the decisions analysed supra lead to the conclusion that international criminal courts or tribunals, including the International Criminal Court, have unequivocally rejected the possibility of the immunity of State officials, both ratione personae and ratione materiae, being invoked in said courts. Moreover, some of the courts have also extended said affirmation to domestic courts, on an exceptional basis. It should be noted that the decisions of international criminal courts or tribunals on this topic have brought into play the special issue of cooperation of domestic courts with international courts and the possible incidence of such cooperation on the immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction. That issue will be analysed later in the present report.[215]

The same argument was applied in decision pursuant to article 87(7) of the Rome Statute on the refusal of the Republic of Chad to comply with the cooperation requests issued by the Court with respect to the arrest and surrender of Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir, of 13 December 2011 (Pre-Trial Chamber I, ICC-02/05-01/09-140, para. 13, in fine).

D. National judicial practice

109. National judicial practice with regard to persons who enjoy immunity and acts that are covered by immunity was analysed in the third and fourth reports of the Special Rapporteur.[216] In the present section, we will analyse the decisions of national courts that have pronounced on the applicability or non-applicability of immunity on specific circumstances and that contain rulings that are relevant for the study of the limitations and exemptions to immunity. For the sake of clarity, those judicial decisions will be analysed as they relate to immunity ratione personae and to immunity ratione materiae. Although the analysis will focus preferably on the decisions of criminal courts or tribunals, the decisions of civil courts will also be taken into account if they are considered useful, as was the case in previous reports.

110. With regard to the decisions concerning immunity ratione personae, it should be noted that almost all national criminal courts or tribunals have held that Heads of State (and in some cases other high-ranking officials) enjoy immunity from foreign criminal jurisdiction during their time in office. The courts have admitted the full applicability of immunity to a variety of offences,[217] including international crimes.[218] This assertion is based on the existence of principles or norms of customary international law. In some cases, the pronouncement in favour of immunity ratione personae has also been in the form of an obiter dictum in cases concerning immunity ratione materiae.[219] In other cases, that declaration stemmed from the exercise of discretionary powers recognized for the Attorney General of a State or for other organs when their intervention is necessary for criminal proceedings to be initiated.[220] Lastly, it is worth noting that while national courts have usually pronounced on immunity in cases brought against State officials, in an exceptional situation, a tribunal made its pronouncement in a case in which an advisory opinion was sought.[221]

111. In some cases, the courts have concluded that only immunity ratione personae may cease to apply if an international treaty establishes clearly that it has been waived or lifted, or cannot be invoked, or if the treaty establishes an exception in that regard.[222] Exceptionally, one court has ruled in favour of an exception to immunity ratione personae in the case of crimes under international law,[223] or referred to the existence of exceptions to said category of immunity that did not subsequently materialize, save for a generic mention in "specific provisions (….) that oblige the parties concerned".[224] Lastly, it should be noted that a French court has declared that

[223] See In re Hussein, Germany, Regional Superior Court of Cologne, judgment of 16 May 2000 (even though the Court considered that the President of Iraq enjoyed immunity ratione personae, it stated that said immunity could be bypassed upon the commission of crimes under international law, although it found that no such crime had been committed in that case).

[224] See Gaddafi, France, Court of Cassation, judgment of 13 March 2001, Criminal Chamber No. 1414, ILR, vol. 125, p. 509. In its judgment, the Court of Cassation stated, in relation to crimes of terrorism, such as those with which the Head of State of Libya was charged, that "in an incumbent Head of State does not enjoy immunity from criminal jurisdiction for acts of corruption and other similar acts.[225]

112. Civil courts have also declared that immunity ratione personae is applicable in cases where the claim against a Head of State was for the commission of serious crimes.[226] That declaration was also formulated in the form of an obiter dictum in some civil cases.[227] However, exceptionally, one court has circumscribed the immunity ratione personae of an incumbent Head of State for official acts, excluding private acts.[228]

113. The judgments of South African courts concerning the argument that the South African authorities should arrest President Al-Bashir pursuant to the arrest warrant issued by the International Criminal Court deserve particular consideration. Both the High Court of South Africa and the Supreme Court of Appeal of South Africa ruled that the immunity ratione personae of an incumbent foreign Head of State was not applicable.[229] However, those rulings were based on the obligation to cooperate with the International Criminal Court and on South African legislation, which expressly provides that no foreign State official who has committed the crime of genocide, crimes against humanity or war crimes may be granted immunity. An appeal against the judgment of the Supreme Court of Appeal has been filed with the Constitutional Court of South Africa; the case was pending determination when this report was finalized.

114. The immunity ratione materiae of foreign State officials has given rise to a greater number of judgments by national criminal courts. The positions adopted by States in those judgments are less uniform, although it can be concluded that domestic courts, in a certain number of cases, have been accepting the existence of limitations and exceptions to immunity in circumstances relating to the commission of international crimes,[230] crimes of corruption or related crimes,[231] and other crimes of the current state of international law, the alleged crimes, although serious, do not constitute an exception to the principle of immunity from jurisdiction of an incumbent foreign Head of State". The judgment does not indicate what those exceptions would be; it merely affirms that "international custom protects incumbent Heads of State from foreign criminal jurisdiction, in the absence of specific binding provisions to the contrary for the parties concerned". In any event, the Court declared that Mr. Gaddafi enjoyed immunity ratione personae. With regard to that case, it is worth noting that the Court of Appeal of Paris had rejected the immunity, alleging that there is "a generally accepted practice in law in all States, including France, whereby immunity from prosecution covers only government or administrative acts carried out by the Head of State, and those acts could not possibly include international crimes" (Court of Appeal of Paris, judgment of 20 October 2000, ILR, vol. 125, p. 498).

In a civil proceeding, the Italian Supreme Court also asserted that State officials who have committed international crimes do not enjoy immunity ratione materiae from criminal jurisdiction (Ferrini v. Federal Republic of Germany, Court of Cassation, judgment of 11 March 2004, ILR, vol. 128, p. 674). In Jones, although the House of Lords recognized immunity from civil jurisdiction, it reiterated that immunity from criminal jurisdiction is not applicable in the case of torture (Jones v. Kingdom of Saudi Arabia, House of Lords, judgment of 14 June 2006 [2006] UKHL 26, [2007] 1 A.C.). Lastly, it should be noted that the Federal High Court of Ethiopia, albeit in the context of a case pursued against an Ethiopian national, affirmed the existence of a rule of international law preventing the application of immunity to a former Head of State accused of international crimes (Special Prosecutor v. Hailemariam, Federal High Court, judgment of 9 October 1995, ILDC 555 (ET 1995)).

officials of another State for international crimes without expressly ruling on immunity.[233]

115. However, national courts have used various arguments to conclude that immunity ratione materiae is not applicable. For example, while some courts have held that immunity should not apply owing to the gravity of the acts committed by the State official,[234] in other cases, the denial of immunity has been based on the violation of jus cogens norms,[235] or even on the consideration that the acts in question cannot be regarded as acts performed in an official capacity since the commission of such crimes cannot, under any circumstances, be considered an ordinary function of the State or of a State official.[236]

[233] This occurred, for example, in the Barbie case before the French courts: Federation Nationale des Déportés et Internés Résistants et Patriotes and others v. Barbie, France, Court of Cassation, judgments of 6 October 1983, 26 January 1984 and 20 December 1985, ILR, vol. 78, p. 125; *Federation Nationale des Déportés et Internés Résistants et Patriotes and others v. Previously, the District Court of Jerusalem had found Eichmann guilty of crimes against humanity, war crimes and crimes against the Jewish people, rejecting the accused's argument that, in his capacity as Head of the Gestapo Department for Jewish Affairs, he should be considered to have been performing "acts of State" (Attorney General v. Eichmann, Israel, Supreme Court, judgment of 29 May 1962, ILR, vol. 36, pp. 309-310). Meanwhile, the National High Court of Spain has tried various foreign officials for international crimes without deeming it necessary to rule on immunity, in the Pinochet, Scilingo, Cavallo, Guatemala, Rwanda and Tibet cases. In the Rwanda case, however, the National High Court ruled against the prosecution of President Kagame on the grounds that he enjoyed immunity. Similarly, in the Tibet case, the National High Court ruled against the prosecution of the then President Hu Jintao; however, following the end of Hu Jintao's term as President of China, the Central Court of Investigation No. 2 of the National High Court allowed his prosecution by order of 9 October 2013, claiming that he no longer enjoyed "diplomatic immunity".

[234] Eichmann, Israel, Supreme Court, judgment of 29 May 1962, ILR, vol. 36, pp. 309-310. In the Ferrini case, the Italian courts based their ruling both on the gravity of the crimes committed and the fact that the conduct in question is contrary to jus cogens (Ferrini v. Federal Republic of Germany, Court of Cassation, judgment of 11 March 2004, ILR, vol. 128, p. 674).

[235] In the Lozano case, the Italian Court of Cassation based its denial of immunity on the violation of fundamental rights, which have the status of jus cogens norms and must therefore take precedence over the rules governing immunity (Lozano v. Italy, Italy, Court of Cassation, judgment of 24 July 2008, ILDC, 1085 (IT 2008), para. 6). In A. v. Office of the Public Prosecutor of the Confederation, the Federal Criminal Court of Switzerland based its decision on the existence of a customary prohibition concerning the commission of international crimes that the Swiss legislator considers to be jus cogens; it also pointed out the contradiction between prohibiting such conduct while continuing to recognize immunity ratione materiae that would prevent the launch of an investigation (A. v. Office of the Public Prosecutor of the Confederation, Switzerland, Federal Criminal Court, judgment of 25 July 2012, BB.2011.140).

[236] See the following cases: Pinochet, Belgium, Court of First Instance of Brussels, judgment of 6 November 1998, ILR, vol. 119, p. 349; In re Hussein, Germany, Higher Regional Court of Cologne, judgment of 16 May 2000, 2 Zs 1330/99, para. 11 (it made this assertion in relation to the hypothesis that the then President Hussein had ceased to hold office)). Lastly, it should be pointed out that, in some cases, German courts have concluded that immunity is not applicable based on the fact that the State of the official no longer exists and that, therefore, the accused no longer has the status of official. Among the cases referring to former officials of the German Democratic Republic are: Border Guards, Federal Criminal Court, judgment of 3 November 1992, ILR, vol. 100, p. 373; Stoph, Federal Constitutional Court, judgment of 21 February 1992, 2BvR 1661/91, para. 4; Mauerschützen, Federal Constitutional Court, judgment of 24 October 1996, 2 BvR 1851/94, 2 BvR 1853/94, 2 BvR 1875/94, 2 BvR 1852/94, para. 127.

116. Meanwhile, civil courts have also been holding immunity to be non-applicable in the same scenarios as those mentioned in the previous paragraph, basing their decisions mainly on the jus cogens nature of the international norms violated (essentially human rights norms and the prohibition of certain types of conduct such as torture) and the categorization of the acts giving rise to the civil suit as ultra vires acts of the official that cannot be described as official acts or that are outside the ordinary scope of a State function.[237]

117. Lastly, it should be noted that national courts, both civil and criminal, have denied immunity in cases involving acts performed by State officials that are closely linked to private interest and whose objective is the personal enrichment of the official and not the benefit of the sovereign, or in corruption-related cases.[238]

118. In any event, national courts have granted immunity ratione materiae even in relation to the aforementioned crimes in a small number of cases;[239] contradictory positions have sometimes been evident in the case law of a given State's courts. However, in some of those cases, the differences in position are attributable to differences in the treatment of immunity in relation to the same facts, depending on whether the case is before the criminal or civil courts.[240]

[240] There have been particular differences in the treatment of immunity ratione materiae by civil

119. Separate analysis is warranted regarding the practice of the United States courts, which have ruled on the immunity ratione materiae of State officials both through application of the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act (in relation only to civil jurisdiction) and through application of the common law doctrine (in relation to both civil and criminal jurisdiction), although the second formula has generally been applied only since the judgment in the Samantar case, in which the Supreme Court held that the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act applies only when the suit is brought against the State stricto sensu and not against one of its individual officials.[241] Under the first formula (Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act), the courts have exclusive responsibility for determining the question of immunity, while under the second formula (common law) the executive has the power to state whether an individual may enjoy immunity or not, through a "suggestion of immunity" that the courts must respect; they are able to decide the matter themselves only if the State Department does not issue a suggestion of immunity.[242]

120. However, in many cases analysed in accordance with the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act, the United States courts have ruled that immunity from jurisdiction is not applicable in cases concerning international crimes and human rights violations, which are generally regarded as ultra vires acts that are performed for the exclusive benefit of the official, do not form part of the regular functions of the State and violate jus cogens norms.[243] Nonetheless, this has not prevented the

and criminal courts in the United Kingdom: see R. v. Bow Street Metropolitan Stipendiary Magistrate ex parte Pinochet Ugarte (No. 3), UKHL 17, [2000] 1 A.C. 147; Jones v. Director of Public Prosecutions (Prince Nasser case), High Court of Justice, Queen's Bench Division, Divisional Court, judgment of 7 October 2014 [2014] EWHC 3419 (Admin.). Regarding this difference in practice, see document A/CN.4/686, para. 56. In Bouzari v. Islamic Republic of Iran, the Court of Appeal for Ontario granted immunity from civil jurisdiction for the Islamic Republic of Iran in a case of torture, although it referred in that regard to the doctrine established by the House of Lords in the Pinochet case for the purpose of distinguishing between immunity from civil jurisdiction and immunity from criminal jurisdiction (2004 CarswellOnt 2681, 243 D.I.R. (4th) 406, 71 O.R. (3d) 675, 122 C.R.R. (2d) 26, 220 O.A.C. 1, para. 91). Similarly, in Fang v. Jiang Zemin, the High Court of New Zealand expressly declared that immunity from criminal jurisdiction would not apply in the case of acts of torture (judgment of 21 December 2006, ILR, vol. 141, p. 717). In a radically different approach, the Italian Court of Cassation stated that the fact that the immunity ratione materiae of State officials from criminal jurisdiction was not applicable in cases concerning the commission of war crimes and crimes against humanity should be interpreted to mean that State immunity was also not applicable when a civil suit was brought against the State for the same acts (Ferrini v. Federal Republic of Germany, Court of Cassation, judgment of 11 March 2004, ILR, vol. 128, p. 674).

United States courts from granting immunity ratione materiae in some cases, even when the acts in respect of which immunity has been claimed constitute international crimes or serious human rights violations.[244] Immunity ratione materiae has been granted with greater frequency in cases where courts have had to make a decision based solely on common law rules, owing essentially to the considerable weight that the executive's opinion, reflected in the "suggestion of immunity", carries in the common law system.[245] That said, there are also some cases where a suggestion of immunity has been issued and the courts have subsequently denied immunity, either in line with the suggestion or because the court, despite the suggestion, has examined the merits of the claim and found the contested acts to be ultra vires or contrary to peremptory norms of international law.[246]

121. In short, the above analysis demonstrates that national courts almost unanimously acknowledge that no limitations or exceptions are applicable to immunity ratione personae. However, with regard to immunity ratione materiae, it can be concluded that the majority trend is to accept the existence of certain limitations and exceptions to such immunity, either in view of the gravity of the crimes, because they violate peremptory norms or undermine values of the international community as a whole, or because the crimes in question cannot be regarded as acts performed in an official capacity since they go beyond or do not correspond to the ordinary functions of the State.

122. To conclude this analysis of domestic case law, reference must be made to the judgment of the Italian Constitutional Court of 22 October 2014, the significance of which was mentioned in the Special Rapporteur's fourth report.[247] That judgment refers to the questions arising from the incorporation into the Italian legal system of the judgment of the International Court of Justice in Jurisdictional Immunities of the State and, consequently, contains arguments pertaining to the jurisdictional immunity of the State stricto sensu. However, the Constitutional Court focuses its arguments to a major extent on jurisdictional immunity and its relationship with the right of access to justice and to effective judicial protection of fundamental rights.[248] Such arguments may be of interest for the present report and are therefore summarized as follows:

(a) The right of access to justice and to effective judicial protection of inviolable human rights is "is one of the greatest principles of legal culture in democratic systems of our times", which can be limited only under specific circumstances;

(b) The jurisdictional immunity of the State may "justify […] the sacrifice of the principle of judicial protection of inviolable rights guaranteed by the [Italian] Constitution" but only when it "is connected — substantially and not just formally — to the sovereign functions of the foreign State, i.e. to the exercise of its governmental powers";

(c) Some acts "such as deportation, forced labour and massacres, recognized to be crimes against humanity [cannot] justify the absolute sacrifice in the domestic legal order of the judicial protection of inviolable rights of the victims of those crimes". "State actions [that] can be considered war crimes and crimes against humanity, [or as] violations of inviolable human rights, (…) [as such] are excluded from the lawful exercise of governmental powers";

(d) Consequently, immunity "does not protect behaviours that do not represent the typical exercise of governmental powers, but are explicitly considered and qualified unlawful, since they are violations of inviolable rights";

(e) Immunity cannot be regarded as an acceptable sacrifice of the aforementioned rights when, as in the case in question, there is no other effective recourse for gaining access to the courts and obtaining effective judicial protection.

[247] The interest generated by this judgment goes far beyond the topic of State immunities and has implications for issues of great relevance, especially those concerning the relationship between international and national law. As an example of such interest, see the in-depth analysis of decision No. 238/2014 in Robert Kolb, "The relationship between the international and the municipal legal order: reflections on the decision No. 238/2014 of the Italian Constitutional Court", Questions of International Law (QIL), Zoom out II (2014), pp. 5-16; Pasquale De Sena, "The judgment of the Italian Constitutional Court on State immunity in cases of serious violations of human rights or humanitarian law: a tentative analysis under international law", Questions of International Law (QIL), Zoom out II (2014), pp. 17-31; Cesare Pinelli, "Between undue fiction and respect for constitutional principles", pp. 33-41; Paolo Palchetti, "Judgment 238/2014 of the Italian Constitutional Court: In search of a way out", Questions of International Law (QIL), Zoom out II (2014), pp. 44-47.

E. Other work of the Commission

123. The Commission has in the past taken up a number of topics of relevance to the present report, in particular the Principles of International Law recognized in the Charter of the Nürnberg Tribunal and in the Judgment of the Tribunal, the draft Code of Crimes against the Peace and Security of Mankind and the articles on responsibility of States for internationally wrongful acts. Each of these instruments contains provisions that are pertinent for determining the scope of the limitations and exceptions to immunity which are analysed below. The Commission also dealt with issues related to limitations and exceptions to immunity in the draft statute for an international criminal court and the draft articles on jurisdictional immunities of States and their property. These last two instruments, however, are discussed elsewhere in this report.[249]

124. The Principles of International Law recognized in the Charter of the Nürnberg Tribunal and in the Judgment of the Tribunal were adopted by the Commission in 1950[250] in response to an express mandate from the General Assembly,[251] which took note of the Principles in its resolution 488 (V) of 12 December 1950. As is well known, these Principles served as a foundation for the Commission's subsequent work on crimes against the peace and security of mankind and on the development of a draft statute for an international criminal court.

125. The document adopted by the Commission includes three basic principles that are relevant for the purposes of the present report: (a) the principle of individual criminal responsibility, which derives from international law regardless of the provisions of national laws;[252] (b) the principle that official position is irrelevant to the determination of responsibility;[253] and (c) the principle that orders received cannot be invoked as a ground for exemption from responsibility.[254] These three principles are closely interrelated and are intended to ensure that perpetrators of international crimes do not go unpunished. Under these principles, any individual who has committed an international crime is responsible therefor, without regard to his or her official position or to whether he or she has acted proprio motu or pursuant to an order received from the Government of a State or from a superior.

[250] Principles of International Law recognized in the Charter of the Nürnberg Tribunal and in the Judgment of the Tribunal, and commentaries thereto (Yearbook of the International Law Commission, 1950, vol. II, pp. 374-378, document A/1316, paras. 95-127, in particular paras. 103-104. Text reproduced in Yearbook ... 1985, vol. II, Part Two, p. 12, para. 45.

[251] Resolution 177 (II) of 21 November 1947.

[252] Principle I reads as follows: "Any person who commits an act which constitutes a crime under international law is responsible therefor and liable to punishment". Principle II establishes that "[t]he fact that internal law does not impose a penalty for an act which constitutes a crime under international law does not relieve the person who committed the act from responsibility under international law" (Yearbook ... 1985, vol. II, Part Two, p. 12, para. 45).

[253] Principle III establishes that "[t]he fact that a person who committed an act which constitutes a crime under international law acted as Head of State or responsible Government official does not relieve him from responsibility under international law" (ibid.).

[254] Principle IV provides that "[t]he fact that a person acted pursuant to order of his Government or of a superior does not relieve him from responsibility under international law, provided a moral choice was in fact possible to him" (ibid.).

126. The above-mentioned principles encompass a series of elements of particular interest, which were highlighted by the Commission in its commentaries thereto. These elements can be summed up as follows:

(a) International law may impose duties and liabilities on individuals directly, without the need for intermediation, just as it does in respect of States. As noted in the fourth report, the Commission thus confirmed the dual responsibility of the State and the individual for the commission of international crimes, recalling in that regard the well-known finding of the Nürnberg Tribunal that "[c]rimes against international law are committed by men, not by abstract entities, and only by punishing individuals who commit such crimes can the provisions of international law be enforced";[255]

(b) International law has supremacy over domestic law, given that, as noted by the Nürnberg Tribunal, "individuals have international duties which transcend the national obligations of obedience imposed by the individual State";[256]

(c) The fact of having acted in an official capacity or pursuant to orders cannot be used to preclude the establishment of individual responsibility for the commission of crimes under international law.[257]

127. Lastly, it should be noted that the Nürnberg Principles, as formulated by the Commission, are essentially substantive in nature and that the adopted text thus does not expressly refer to immunity as a procedural bar to the exercise of jurisdiction by either a national or an international court. This substantive dimension of the Principles should nonetheless be understood in the light of their connection to the Charter of the Nürnberg Tribunal and the Judgment of the Tribunal, in which the Tribunal is assumed to have jurisdiction and the invocation of official capacity or the duty of obedience is seen essentially as a form of substantive defence whose validity is ruled out in the Charter and the Judgment of the Tribunal. This does not mean that the Tribunal never referred, directly or indirectly, to immunity in its Judgment, as shown by the following statements quoted by the Commission in its commentary to Principle III:[258]

> "The principle of international law which, under certain circumstances, protects the representatives of a State cannot be applied to acts which are condemned as criminal by international law. The authors of these acts cannot shelter themselves behind their official position in order to be freed from punishment."
> "He who violates the laws of war cannot obtain immunity while acting in pursuance of the authority of the State if the State in authorizing action moves outside its competence under international law."

128. In a similar vein, the Commission took up the aforementioned issues in both the draft Code of Offences against the Peace and Security of Mankind, adopted in 1954,[259] and the draft Code of Crimes against the Peace and Security of Mankind, adopted in 1996,[260] although the analysis below refers chiefly to the latter Code. In that text, the Commission again reiterates the principles of individual criminal responsibility,[261] irrelevance of official position[262] and the inability to invoke orders received from a Government or a superior.[263]

129. Like the 1950 formulation, the text adopted by the Commission defines these principles in essentially substantive terms and does not expressly refer to immunity in the procedural sense. It should nevertheless be pointed out that the Commission's commentaries to the draft Code go into more detail with respect to immunity in relation to crimes against the peace and security of mankind, which it rejects in both substantive and procedural terms. For example, in the commentary to article 7, on the irrelevance of official position, the Commission affirms as follows:

> "A government official who plans, instigates, authorizes or orders such crimes not only provides the means and the personnel required to commit the crime, but also abuses the authority and power entrusted to him. He may, therefore, be considered to be even more culpable than the subordinate who actually commits the criminal act. It would be paradoxical to allow the individuals who are, in some respects, the most responsible for the crimes covered by the Code to invoke the sovereignty of the State and to hide behind the immunity that is conferred on them by virtue of their positions particularly since these heinous crimes shock the conscience of mankind, violate some of the most fundamental rules of international law and threaten international peace and security".[264]

130. In the commentary to this same article it concludes that State officials can invoke neither substantive nor procedural immunity, arguing as follows:

> "Article 7 is intended to prevent an individual who has committed a crime against the peace and security of mankind from invoking his official position

[261] Under article 2, para. 1, of the 1996 draft Code, "[a] crime against the peace and security of mankind entails individual responsibility" (ibid., p. 18), which, under article 3, shall result in "punishment" that "shall be commensurate with the character and gravity of the crime" (ibid., p. 2). In a similar vein, see article 1 of the 1954 draft Code, which establishes that "[o]ffences against the peace and security of mankind, as defined in this Code, are crimes under international law, for which the responsible individuals shall be punished" (Yearbook ... 1954, vol. II, p. 151).

[262] Under article 7 of the 1996 draft Code, "[t]he official position of an individual who commits a crime against the peace and security of mankind, even if he acted as head of State or Government, does not relieve him of criminal responsibility or mitigate punishment" (Yearbook ... 1996, vol. II, Part Two, p. 26). The 1954 draft Code, meanwhile, establishes in its article 3 that "[t]he fact that a person acted as Head of State or as responsible government official does not relieve him of responsibility for committing any of the offences defined in this Code" (Yearbook ... 1954, vol. II, p. 152).

[263] The 1996 draft Code enshrines this principle in article 5, which stipulates that "[t]he fact that an individual charged with a crime against the peace and security of mankind acted pursuant to an order of a Government or a superior does not relieve him of criminal responsibility, but may be considered in mitigation of punishment if justice so requires" (Yearbook ... 1996, vol. II, Part Two, p. 23). The 1954 draft Code reflected this principle in article 4, which provides that "[t]he fact that a person charged with an offence defined in this Code acted pursuant to an order of his Government or of a superior does not relieve him of responsibility in international law if, in the circumstances at the time, it was possible for him not to comply with that order" (Yearbook ... 1954, vol. II, p. 152).

[264] Yearbook ... 1996, vol. II., Part Two, pp. 26-27, para. (1) of the commentary to article 7. In para. (3) of the commentary, the Commission recalls that "the Nürnberg Tribunal rejected the plea of act of State and that of immunity which were submitted by several defendants as a valid defence or ground for immunity" (ibid., p. 27).

> as a circumstance absolving him from responsibility or conferring any immunity upon him, even if he claims that the acts constituting the crime were performed in the exercise of his functions. As recognized by the Nürnberg Tribunal in its Judgment, the principle of international law which protects State representatives in certain circumstances does not apply to acts which constitute crimes under international law. Thus, an individual cannot invoke his official position to avoid responsibility for such an act. As further recognized by the Nürnberg Tribunal in its Judgment, the author of a crime under international law cannot invoke his official position to escape punishment in appropriate proceedings. The absence of any procedural immunity with respect to prosecution or punishment in appropriate judicial proceedings is an essential corollary of the absence of any substantive immunity or defence. It would be paradoxical to prevent an individual from invoking his official position to avoid responsibility for a crime only to permit him to invoke this same consideration to avoid the consequences of this responsibility."[265]

131. These statements in the commentaries are also of particular interest in relation to the topic of the present report, given that the Commission views the rule on the irrelevance of official position as applying to both national and international courts. While it is true that the Commission indicated that "[j]udicial proceedings before an international criminal court would be the quintessential example of appropriate judicial proceedings in which an individual could not invoke any substantive or procedural immunity based on his official position to avoid prosecution and punishment",[266] it is also true that it expects the draft Code to have a particular bearing on domestic laws and courts. Thus, it not only makes the general statement that "national courts are expected to play an important role in the implementation of the Code",[267] but also includes the following remark in its commentary to article 8, on the establishment of jurisdiction over the crimes in question:

> "The Commission considered that the effective implementation of the Code required a combined approach to jurisdiction based on the broadest jurisdiction of national courts together with the possible jurisdiction of an international criminal court."[268]

It goes on to say that "the provision and indeed the Code do not apply to those [international] tribunals which are governed by their respective statutes".[269]

132. It may therefore be concluded that, in the Commission's view, the provisions of the draft Code are intended in particular for national courts.[270] In setting out the

In the commentary to article 9, concerning the aut dedere aut judicare principle, in referring to potential grounds for granting immunity to an alleged offender in exchange for cooperation with the justice system, the Commission also stated that "[i]t would be contrary to the interests of the international community as a whole to permit a State to confer immunity on an individual who was responsible for a crime under international law such as genocide" (ibid., p. 31, para. (4) of the commentary).

requirement that the State "enact any procedural or substantive measures that may be necessary to enable it to effectively exercise jurisdiction",[271] it also includes the obligation to adopt provisions that rule out the applicability of immunity under the terms defined by the Commission in its commentaries to the draft Code.

133. Lastly, it should be borne in mind that both the Nürnberg Principles and the draft Code of Crimes against the Peace and Security of Mankind list a series of crimes under international law. The Nürnberg Principles include what are termed crimes against peace, war crimes and crimes against humanity.[272] The draft Code characterizes the crime of aggression, the crime of genocide, crimes against humanity, crimes against United Nations and associated personnel, and war crimes.[273] The Commission may wish to take this list of crimes, which was developed by the Commission itself, into account in identifying acts which, in principle, could be classified as international crimes for the purpose of determining limitations or exceptions to immunity.

134. While the articles on responsibility of States for internationally wrongful acts[274] do not, for obvious reasons, deal with possible limitations and exceptions to the immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction, they do contain a number of concepts that may be useful for the purposes of this report, as they are closely related to certain arguments that have been put forward and debated in the literature and in practice as grounds for such limitations or exceptions. Additionally, in its commentaries to the articles, the Commission contributes elements that could be useful for this study, insofar as they help to situate crimes under international law more appropriately in the international legal system. These inputs essentially consist of the following:

(i) the establishment of the primacy of peremptory norms;

(ii) the affirmation of the existence of obligations to the international community as a whole;

(iii) the definition of a specific model for responding to cases involving a serious breach of an obligation arising under a peremptory norm; and

(iv) the identification of the most serious crimes under international law as breaches of peremptory norms.

135. The Commission deals with the first of these issues in its commentary to article 26 (Compliance with peremptory norms), which seeks to preserve the primacy of such norms, even in cases involving "circumstances precluding wrongfulness".[275] In this context, the Commission addresses the relationship between a peremptory norm and a non-peremptory norm, concluding that the former must prevail. In the Commission's view, this primacy is evident when there is a conflict between two primary norms, but it also holds true when the conflict is between primary and secondary norms, with the result that — in the Commission's words — the application of secondary rules (in respect of rules precluding wrongfulness) does "not authorize or excuse any derogation from a peremptory norm of general international law".[276] The example given by the Commission in this connection is telling: "a State taking countermeasures may not derogate from such a norm: for example, a genocide cannot justify a counter-genocide".[277]

136. In its reasoning, the Commission also includes another element of considerable interest in relation to the primacy of peremptory norms, noting that sometimes a conflict between primary norms need not be resolved by means of the secondary rules concerning responsibility. On the contrary, "[w]here there is an apparent conflict between primary obligations, one of which arises for a State directly under a peremptory norm of general international law, it is evident that such an obligation must prevail. The processes of interpretation and application should resolve such questions", given that "peremptory norms of general international law generate strong interpretative principles which will resolve all or most apparent conflicts".[278] This type of "conforming interpretation" could therefore be of particular importance in relation to the topic of the present report, for the purpose of finding an appropriate balance among various primary norms.

137. Secondly, it should be noted that, in its commentary to Part Two, chapter III, of the articles (Serious breaches of obligations under peremptory norms of general international law), the Commission refers to the existence of "a qualitative distinction ... between different breaches of international law"[279] and to the existence of "the notion of obligations to the international community as a whole",[280] both of which are categories dealt with in the case law of the International Court of Justice. The Commission does not take a position as to whether or not "peremptory norms of general international law and obligations to the international community as a whole are aspects of a single basic idea", but concludes that "there is at the very least substantial overlap between them", as shown by the fact that the examples which the Court has given of obligations towards the international community as a whole "all concern obligations which, it is generally accepted, arise under peremptory norms of general international law".[281] In any event, the Commission takes the view that "[t]he obligations referred to in article 40 arise from those substantive rules of conduct that prohibit what has come to be seen as intolerable because of the threat it presents to the survival of States and their peoples and the most basic human values".[282]

138. Also of note is the fact that the Commission mentions, in its commentaries, the existence of a purposive difference between the concepts of jus cogens and obligations to the international community as a whole, which is worth repeating here:

> "While peremptory norms of general international law focus on the scope and priority to be given to a certain number of fundamental obligations, the focus of obligations to the international community as a whole is essentially on the > legal interest of all States in compliance – i.e. (…) in being entitled to invoke the responsibility of any State in breach."[283]

139. The consideration of the special nature of obligations towards the international community as a whole that arise under peremptory norms leads the Commission to discern a different regime with respect to the legal action to be taken in response to serious breaches of obligations under peremptory norms of international law, which can be summed up as follows: (a) "[these] breaches (...) can attract additional consequences, not only for the responsible State but for all other States" (art. 41); and (b) "all States are entitled to invoke responsibility for breaches of obligations to the international community as a whole" (art. 48).[284] This third strand of the Commission's thinking is also of relevance to the present report, especially as it refers to the possibility of establishing a different legal regime for the immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction when such immunity is invoked with respect to acts that can be characterized as breaches of obligations towards the international community as a whole that arise under peremptory norms of international law.

140. Lastly, in relation to these articles, the Commission describes as "peremptory norms that are clearly accepted and recognized" several types of prohibited conduct that correspond to acts in respect of which the immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction has been invoked,[285] namely: "the prohibitions of (…) genocide, slavery, racial discrimination, crimes against humanity and torture",[286] together with the basic rules of international humanitarian law applicable in armed conflict[287] and the "principles and rules concerning the basic rights of the human person".[288] The Commission can take this list of crimes, which was developed by the Commission itself in 2001, into account in identifying crimes that could be classified as international crimes for the purpose of determining exceptions to immunity.

[283] Ibid., p. 112, para. (7) of the commentary to chap. III. The Commission does not define the concept of "international community as a whole", but the mere fact of its use is of considerable interest, given that it stresses the collective dimension of the values and interests to be protected. The Commission moreover points out that this phrase is frequently used in treaties and other international instruments (ibid., p. 84, para. (18) of the commentary to article 25), and the list of treaties cited by the Commission as using this expression is significant: "third preambular paragraph of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of Crimes against Internationally Protected Persons, including Diplomatic Agents; fourth preambular paragraph of the International Convention Against the Taking of Hostages; fifth preambular paragraph of the Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts against the Safety of Maritime Navigation; third preambular paragraph of the Convention on the Safety of United Nations and Associated Personnel; tenth preambular paragraph of the International Convention for the Suppression of Terrorist Bombings; ninth preambular paragraph of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court; and ninth preambular paragraph of the International Convention for the Suppression of the Financing of Terrorism" (ibid., p. 84, footnote 404).

III. Limitations and exceptions within the general legal context of immunity from foreign criminal jurisdiction: methodological and conceptual issues

141. After the analysis of practice and before the analysis of factors that could determine the inapplicability of immunity in a particular case, it is necessary at this point to consider some methodological and conceptual elements that will enable us to better define the context in which the draft articles contained in this report are to be understood. To that end, the following general issues are analysed below: (a) the legal nature of immunity and its relationship to jurisdiction and criminal responsibility; (b) the treatment of immunity in national courts and international criminal courts and its impact on limitations and exceptions to immunity; and (c) the concept of limitations and exceptions.

142. These elements are considered on the basis of a view of international law as a normative system that includes, as one of its parts or components, the institution of immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction. This approach requires that immunity be analysed not in isolation, but in connection with the rest of the norms and institutions that make up the system. From this standpoint, the immunity of State officials is a useful and necessary institution for ensuring that certain values and legal principles of the international legal order, in particular the principle of sovereign equality, are respected. But at the same time, the immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction, as a component of this system, should be interpreted in a systemic fashion to ensure that this institution does not produce negative effects on, or nullify, other components of the contemporary system of international law understood as a whole.[289] This systemic approach requires that other institutions that are also related to the principle of sovereignty, especially the right to exercise jurisdiction, be taken into account, together with other sectors of the international legal order that reflect and embody other values and principles of the international community as a whole, in particular international human rights law and international criminal law. As international law is a genuine normative system, the Commission's development of a set of draft articles meant to assist States in the codification and progressive development of international law with respect to a problematic but highly important issue for the international community cannot (and should not) have the effect of introducing imbalances in significant sectors of the international legal order that have developed over recent decades and that are now among its defining characteristics.

A. Legal nature of immunity

143. One of the threads that emerge from an analysis of the Commission's debates thus far is the constant presence of three elements that are related to the very nature of immunity and have a bearing on the question of limitations and exceptions: (a) the understanding of immunity as a stand-alone right or as an exception to the exercise of the forum State's right to exercise jurisdiction; (b) the characterization of immunity as an exclusively procedural institution that does not affect the individual criminal responsibility of State officials; and (c) the idea that immunity from foreign criminal jurisdiction is separate from other forms of sovereign immunity, especially State immunity. While some of these issues have been discussed in the Special Rapporteur's previous reports, it is necessary at this point to revert to them in order to analyse briefly, as an aid to understanding and exclusively in connection with the topic of limitations and exceptions, the relationship between three pairs of concepts: (a) immunity and jurisdiction; (b) immunity and responsibility; and (c) immunity of the State and immunity of State officials.

1. Relationship between immunity and jurisdiction

144. The relationship between immunity and jurisdiction has been discussed previously in the course of the Commission's work. In her second report, the Special Rapporteur drew attention to the interaction between these two elements, especially the fact that immunity does not exist in a vacuum and cannot be invoked except in relation to an existing jurisdiction.[290] This echoes the reasoning of the International Court of Justice in Arrest Warrant.

145. The existence of jurisdiction is thus the point of departure on which immunity is founded; neither practice nor doctrine has refuted this observation. It suffices to recall that, as a rule, when national courts have taken decisions on claims of immunity, they have not found that they lack jurisdiction in abstract terms, but rather that they are unable to exercise it in respect of an official of a third State who enjoys immunity. There have thus been cases in which, once the circumstance that gave rise to immunity no longer exists, national courts have exercised jurisdiction over the same acts and the same individuals, and no difficulties have arisen with regard to competence.

146. The prior existence of jurisdiction is a logical requirement that does not detract from the importance of immunity as a necessary and useful instrument for protecting certain values and legal principles of the international community, especially the principle of the sovereign equality of States and the maintenance of stable international relations; nor, conversely, can it be understood to mean that the right to exercise jurisdiction has absolute primacy, in all circumstances, over immunity. On the contrary, the purpose of immunity is precisely to freeze or block the exercise of jurisdiction in certain conditions, sometimes on an exclusively temporary basis. Thus, in practice, immunity can prevail over jurisdiction in a particular case.

147. Nonetheless, the view of jurisdiction as a pre-existing power of the State, a prius that necessarily precedes immunity, inevitably has certain consequences of considerable importance at the methodological level. These consequences can be summed up as follows:

(a) Immunity is understood ab initio as a restriction of the exercise of jurisdiction; it is thus in itself a limitation or exception to the adjudicatory jurisdiction of the forum State.

(b) Like any limitation or restriction of a sovereign power of the State, it should be understood in purposive terms: immunity is recognized in order to safeguard values, interests and principles of the international community which, in this case, are embodied in the principle of sovereign equality, the proper exercise of State functions without undue interference by a third party and the stability of international relations.

(c) Given that immunity constitutes a restriction of a pre-existing sovereign power, the determination of its scope and its interpretation must remain within the limits defined by the ends sought. In particular, it can be invoked only in the interest of the State whose sovereign equality it claims to preserve, and only for the purpose of safeguarding legitimate rights and interests of the State that are protected under international law.

(d) The relationship between the exercise of jurisdiction and immunity must, then, be interpreted in dialectical terms, in order to find an appropriate balance between the rights and interests of the forum State and the rights and interests of the State of the official. Whether the exercise of jurisdiction or immunity prevails in each particular case will depend on the rights and interests at stake and on the set of norms, values and legal principles on which those rights and interests are based.

2. Relationship between immunity and responsibility

148. The analysis of immunity from foreign criminal jurisdiction has traditionally been based on the premise that it is a procedural rather than a substantive instrument, the application of which does not imply the disappearance of the responsibility, in this case criminal responsibility that can arise from unlawful conduct. This view of immunity is closely related to the way in which immunity operates in practice, with the primary goal of blocking and preventing the exercise of criminal jurisdiction in a particular case by the courts of the forum State when they seek to take action against an official of a third State. In strictly theoretical terms, this general description of immunity cannot be denied and must be accepted as the point of departure for any analysis that purports to contribute to the effort to define the legal nature of immunity.

149. This view of immunity as a mere procedural bar has been echoed in the literature and in case law, especially at the international level, as reflected by the foregoing analysis of practice. From this standpoint, immunity and responsibility cannot be confused with each other, and immunity cannot be assumed to give rise to impunity. On the contrary, as the International Court of Justice has made clear, it is possible, in spite of immunity, for individual criminal responsibility to be determined by means other than the exercise of jurisdiction by the courts of the forum State. Consequently, it appears that immunity from jurisdiction has the sole effect of preventing the determination of responsibility by means of a specific legal channel, leaving open the possibility that such responsibility may be established through other procedural mechanisms better suited to the purpose.

150. Nevertheless, this description of immunity as a mere procedural bar and the fundamental distinction between immunity and responsibility are difficult to support in absolute terms, especially in the field of criminal law. The analysis of practice and the necessary teleological interpretation of immunity lead to more nuanced conclusions. One example that comes to mind is the fine line that separates the invocation of official position as a substantive defence to avoid responsibility from its invocation as a procedural defence to avoid the exercise of jurisdiction. It suffices to recall how the Nürnberg Tribunal used the term in both senses and how the polysemic use of the irrelevance of official position has found its way into both case law and quite a few of the international instruments analysed in the present report.

151. The acknowledgement of this issue even prompted the International Court of Justice to offer an alternative model for establishing responsibility that respects immunity and avoids impunity. However, the Court's efforts to overcome the confusion between immunity and impunity are not fully convincing for the purpose of inferring a fundamental separation between immunity and responsibility. This distinction raises no issues whatsoever in cases where there are genuine and accessible means of redress for establishing the criminal responsibility of a particular State official when such responsibility cannot be established before a particular court because immunity has been invoked. Conversely, when such alternative means of redress do not exist or are not effective in achieving this purpose, the distinction between immunity and exemption from criminal responsibility, and even between immunity and impunity, will inevitably become less clear-cut.

152. Thus, the strictly procedural nature of the immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction, even when taken as a point of departure, presents certain limitations in practice that must be duly taken into account in analysing the question of limitations and exceptions. This idea is especially relevant in the case of immunity ratione materiae, which is closely related to acts that can give rise to the criminal responsibility of an official and which continues even after the State official finishes his or her term of office or loses his or her status as an official. The permanent nature of this type of immunity should also be considered, as it can, in some circumstances, have additional consequences with respect to the distinction between immunity and impunity.

3. Relationship between immunity of the State and immunity of State officials

153. The final element to be considered at this stage is the distinction between the immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction and the immunity of the State stricto sensu. This question was analysed in detail in the Special Rapporteur's fourth report, particularly as it relates to the "single act, dual responsibility" approach and the criminal nature of the jurisdiction from which the immunity of State officials can be invoked.[291]

154. Although both elements have a bearing on the question of limitations and exceptions to immunity, it is unnecessary to revert to that topic at this point. For the purposes of the present report, it suffices to reiterate below the main conclusions set forth in the 2015 report:

(a) The attribution of an act to the State is the point of departure for determining whether an act has been performed in an official capacity. This attribution is not sufficient in itself, however, to conclude that a State official enjoys immunity in respect of the act.

(b) A single act can give rise to two different types of responsibility: international in the case of the State and criminal in the case of the individual. The existence of two types of responsibility translates into two types of immunity (of the State and of its official).

[291] Document A/CN.4/686, paras. 96-117).

(c) While both categories of immunity have the common purpose of protecting State interests, it cannot be concluded that they are subject to identical conditions or to the same legal regime.

155. Accordingly, the regime for limitations and exceptions to immunity may also differ depending on whether the immunity in question is the immunity of the State or the immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction, without the possibility of mimetically transposing the first into the second or vice versa.[292]

B. National and international criminal courts or tribunals

156. A second general element to be considered in addressing the issue of limitations and exceptions to immunity is the existence of international criminal courts mandated to try cases involving crimes with the greatest international impact. Although these courts have been outside the scope of the present topic, they have a clear relationship with national criminal courts, and this relationship has practical consequences for the invocation of immunity. Thus, for the purpose of defining the limitations and exceptions applicable to immunity from foreign criminal jurisdiction, it is useful to analyse the impact that international criminal courts can have on the institution of immunity.

157. This question may be approached from two opposite viewpoints. The first assumes that the establishment of international criminal courts and the impossibility of invoking immunity before them have no bearing on the regime applicable to the immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction. According to this view, the different natures of the two types of courts translate into two different immunity regimes. This means that, even though immunity from jurisdiction cannot be invoked before international courts, it remains fully valid and can be invoked in national courts. The second approach, in contrast, is based on the unity of the objectives and principles applicable to the prosecution of international crimes, regardless of whether their perpetrators are tried before an international criminal court or a domestic court. As both jurisdictions serve the purpose of determining individual criminal responsibility and preventing impunity for the most serious international crimes, the rules concerning immunity must be applied in accordance with the same parameters. Thus, the mere existence of international criminal courts and the impossibility of invoking any type of immunity before them should imply that it is impossible for anyone, including State officials, to invoke immunity from criminal jurisdiction before the courts of a State.

158. These two approaches focus on two different elements: the procedural nature of immunity, in the first case, and the substantive nature of individual criminal responsibility for the commission of international crimes, in the second. Moreover, complementary arguments are often adduced in support of each of these views, especially the difference between national and international courts in terms of their relationship to the principle of sovereignty, and the question of whether or not criminal responsibility can be determined by alternative means. As noted supra, all these arguments have even been reflected in decisions adopted by international courts, including the International Court of Justice, the European Court of Human Rights and the Special Court for Sierra Leone.

159. The two approaches described above are highly theoretical, however, and overlook some very important elements that characterize the interconnection between national and international courts. Chief among these elements are the identical nature of the criminal offences or prohibited conduct dealt with by the two types of courts, the definition of a system for the division of competences among competing jurisdictions and the establishment of mechanisms for two-way cooperation and judicial assistance between the two categories of criminal courts.

160. The relevance of this model of interconnection is not theoretical; the model has significant practical consequences in the area of cooperation between courts, as illustrated recently in relation to the attempted arrest of President Al-Bashir in South Africa in execution of a warrant issued by the International Criminal Court. But this example, albeit the most high-profile in terms of media coverage, is not unique. It is also important to bear in mind the phenomenon of hybrid and internationalized criminal court or tribunals, the difficulty of categorizing them as either domestic or international tribunals and the consequences that this has for the institution of the immunity of State officials from jurisdiction.[293] It should also be recalled that the exercise of immunity before domestic courts can have an impact on the system for the division of competences in the case of competing jurisdictions, especially under the complementarity principle laid down in the Rome Statute.

161. Given these elements, the relationship between national criminal courts and international criminal courts needs to be considered in a more nuanced and balanced manner that takes into account the distinction between national jurisdiction and international jurisdiction while also bearing in mind the connections referred to above. This relationship will also need to be taken into account in the present report, albeit without altering the scope of the topic approved by the Commission.

162. To that end, it is useful to analyse, first, the immunity regime applicable before international criminal courts or tribunals, especially the International Criminal Court, the International Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia, the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda, the Special Court for Sierra Leone, the Special Tribunal for Lebanon, the Extraordinary Chambers in the Courts of Cambodia, the Kosovo panels, the Special Panels for Serious Crimes in East Timor, the Extraordinary African Chambers within the Senegalese judicial system and the War Crimes Chamber of the State Court of Bosnia and Herzegovina. As all of these tribunals have specialized jurisdiction for the prosecution of international crimes, the way in which immunity is applied before them can shed light on a possible limitation or exception for crimes under international law in the context of the present topic.

163. As noted previously, the International Criminal Court, the International Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia and the Special Court for Sierra Leone have ruled that the immunity of State officials from criminal jurisdiction is not applicable before them.[294] Nevertheless, only the Rome Statute includes an express reference to the question of immunity, in its article 27;[295] this model was subsequently followed by the Special Panels for Serious Crimes in East Timor.[296] Meanwhile, the statutes of the ad hoc Tribunals contain only a general provision on the irrelevance of official position or orders from a superior as grounds for exemption from or limitation of the scope of individual criminal responsibility;[297] this wording was also followed by the Special Court for Sierra Leone,[298] the Extraordinary Chambers in the Courts of Cambodia,[299] the War Crimes Chamber of the State Court of Bosnia and Herzegovina[300] and the Extraordinary African Chambers within the Senegalese Judicial System.[301] The rules governing the special war crimes panels in Kosovo[302] and the Special Tribunal for Lebanon[303] do not contain any provisions on official capacity; they only state that orders from commanders or superiors may not be invoked. This difference in the applicable rules is explained to some extent by the greater or lesser likelihood that officials of the foreign State will be brought before these tribunals, except in the case of the ad hoc Tribunals, where, by definition, this was a real possibility, yet they do not refer to immunity (which did not prevent them from considering that it cannot be invoked). In any event, even in the rules governing the International Criminal Court and the Special Panels for East Timor, the ruling-out of immunity is established in close connection with the clause on the irrelevance of official position.

164. It should be borne in mind that the interpretation of the rule that immunities cannot be invoked before international criminal courts is not without controversy. Although this rule is, in theory, a characteristic feature of these jurisdictions, it is useful to recall, in this regard, the debate on the interpretation of article 98, paragraph 1, of the Rome Statute and its relationship to article 27,[304] which took on special importance in connection with Al-Bashir as a result of a number of non-cooperation decisions taken by some African countries and the International Criminal Court decisions on non-cooperation analysed supra in the overview of international judicial practice.[305] In any event, it should be noted that, strictly speaking, article 98, paragraph 1, only limits the obligation to cooperate with the Court in respect of the surrender of a person who enjoys immunity under international law, and this limitation, moreover, applies only to a request for the surrender of a national of a State that is not a party to the Statute.[306] From this standpoint, the limitation introduced by article 98, paragraph 1, does not, strictly speaking, affect the non-inability to invoke immunity from the Court's jurisdiction, but rather the ability to invoke such immunity in respect of measures that must be taken by national courts in order to fulfil the obligation to cooperate with the Court. Furthermore, practice shows that controversy has arisen exclusively in relation to Heads of State (Presidents Al-Bashir and Kenyatta), meaning that the issue relates essentially to the topic of immunity ratione personae. This, in short, was the issue raised before the South African courts in relation to the arrest of President Al-Bashir,[307] revealing the close relationship between the exercise of immunity before national courts and before international courts and the need for a systemic interpretation of both situations.[308]

165. This topic was further complicated by the African Union's adoption, in 2015, of the Malabo Protocol establishing the International Criminal Law Section of the African Court of Justice and Human Rights. The Protocol was intended to resolve, at the regional level, the problems caused by the disputed interpretation of article 98, paragraph 1, of the Rome Statute in relation to two serving African Heads of State by including the following article in the Statute of the African Court:

> "No charges shall be commenced or continued before the Court against any serving AU Head of State or Government, or anybody acting or entitled to act in such capacity, or other senior state officials based on their functions, during their tenure of office."[309]

166. This initiative created a model of regional criminal jurisdiction that breaks, albeit only partially, with the rule that State officials cannot invoke immunity from the exercise of jurisdiction by international criminal courts. While it is not necessary to analyse that provision for the purpose of this report,[310] the mere fact of its adoption shows how the exercise of international criminal jurisdiction may, in practice, encounter problems related to the immunity of State officials from jurisdiction. It thus appears that the amendment of the Statute of the African Court may represent a turning point in the conception of international criminal jurisdiction as an alternative to the exercise of national criminal jurisdiction with regard to international crimes.

167. In any case, this was not the only attempt to seek an African solution to the question of the prosecution of Heads of State or former Heads of State for war crimes or crimes against humanity. On the contrary, the establishment of the Extraordinary African Chambers within the Senegalese Judicial System offers another example that is more comparable to the cases of the ad hoc Tribunals and internationalized tribunals. This arrangement, under which a court within the Senegalese judicial system was able to try a former Head of State for the commission, inter alia, of crimes against humanity and war crimes, confirmed that immunity cannot be invoked in cases involving such crimes. This is demonstrated by the fact that the judgment against Hissène Habré, whereby he was found guilty of these crimes and sentenced to life imprisonment, made no reference to immunity.[311]

168. The paragraph of the preamble to the Rome Statute recalling that "it is the duty of every State to exercise its criminal jurisdiction over those responsible for international crimes"[312] takes on special significance in this context. That statement lays the foundation for the principle of complementarity laid down in the Rome Statute as an instrument for determining the division of competences between the International Criminal Court and national courts. In line with this principle, the role of national courts should be neither underestimated nor sidelined.[313] On the contrary, strengthening the capacity of national courts to try cases involving international crimes is now an essential element of the new model of international criminal justice and has even given rise to the concept of "positive complementarity".[314]

[314] Put forward by the Assembly of States Parties to the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, this concept was discussed at the Kampala Review Conference and led to a number of follow-up initiatives within the Assembly itself.

169. Against this backdrop, the recognition of the key role of domestic courts in combating international crimes and the need to ensure the effectiveness of their judicial proceedings are two factors that cannot be overlooked by the Commission. The Commission may therefore find it useful to take this factor into account in its deliberations on the subject of limitations and exceptions to the immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction.[315]

C. Concept of limitations and exceptions to immunity

170. Throughout this fifth report, the expression "limitations and exceptions to immunity" has as if it represents a single category, in reference to cases where the immunity of a State official does not operate before the courts of another State. However, as indicated in the fourth report, the words "limitations" and "exceptions" each represent a separate concept. A "limitation" refers to any element that marks the boundaries of an institution; it must therefore be situated within those boundaries, because it is related to the elements that make up such an institution. An "exception", on the other hand, lies outside the institution; although the institution still retains its boundaries, it may, in certain circumstances, not apply owing to existence of elements outside the institution.

171. If we apply this distinction to limitations and exceptions to the immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction, the limitations to immunity are necessarily related to the normative elements that define each category of immunity, whereas exceptions are defined by external elements which may derive from other components of the international legal order and in respect of which normative elements play a secondary role. From that perspective, the beneficiaries of immunity, the concept of acts performed in an official capacity and the temporal dimension of immunity should be considered as categories around which the limitations to immunity are established. By contrast, compliance with the values and legal principles of international law as a whole and the need to ensure that immunity does not generate undesired effects on other areas of international law (such as international criminal law, international humanitarian law or international human rights law) would constitute the starting point for the definition of exceptions to immunity.

172. This theoretical distinction is, however, not so neatly reflected in practice. As indicated in chapter III of the present report, the words "limitation" and "exception" are not used systematically by international tribunals, or in the comments and statements of States, or in judicial, legislative or treaty practice. In the majority of cases, the States and legal operators dealing with the phenomenon of immunity have not always used the same words, and sometimes have not even asserted that there is a limitation or exception to immunity; they merely affirm that immunity does not apply or that it cannot be invoked in national courts. On the other hand, it should be noted that the use of both words in respect of the same act has not been consistent or conclusive, including when legal operators have referred clearly to the distinction between limitations and exceptions. In this connection, the case of torture or international crimes in general, is significant: while for some legal operators such crimes constitute a limitation, for others they are an exception. However, in all those cases, the ultimate goal is the same: to declare that immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction cannot be invoked in relation to a given type of conduct. To put it differently, both cases involve the "non-applicability" of the immunity regime, leaving the jurisdiction of the forum State intact.

173. However, this issue is not new or even exclusive to the present topic. In this connection, it suffices to recall past practice as reflected in some conventions dealing with immunity, which were developed from draft articles that had previously been adopted by the Commission. The Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations, the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations, the Convention on Special Missions, the Vienna Convention on the Representation of States in their Relations with International Organizations of a Universal Character — to name only those that are most closely related to our topic — do not establish any distinction between limitations and exceptions. They merely list cases in which some of the immunities regulated in those instruments do not apply. The most significant example is still the United Nations Convention on Jurisdictional Immunities of States and Their Property, which does not make any distinction between limitations and exceptions, and which treats under the same heading (Part III of the Convention) causes of non-applicability based not only on the acts of the State but also on the consequences of said acts, on the property over which jurisdiction is being sought, or the existence of special dispute-settlement mechanisms agreed between the parties.

174. For the purposes of the present topic, a categorical distinction between limitations and exceptions does not appear necessary. In addition, as noted in the fourth report, deciding between the concepts of limitations and exceptions in relation to specific cases may have consequences far beyond the regime of immunity, especially in the case of international crimes and the consequences that the characterization of such crimes as a limitation or exception might have on the regime of international State responsibility.[316] Consequently, in the view of the Special Rapporteur, it is more sensible (and more reflective of practice) to consider the topic from the general perspective of immunity that it cannot be invoked in specific circumstances, most prominently in the case of crimes under international law. This will be the focus of draft article 7, which is included in the present report.

175. In any event, it should be noted that limitations and exceptions are not treated as separate elements in the present report, solely to ensure that the draft articles proposed could cover both concepts. Nonetheless, the distinction between limitations and exceptions is of methodological interest, especially in light of the hermeneutical criteria that must be used to determine the existence of a limitation or exception to immunity. For example, the criteria for identifying limitations must be intricately linked to the normative elements of immunity, in particular acts that may be covered by immunity, and must be interpreted essentially in light of the existing relationship between immunity and jurisdiction. In the case of exceptions, however, the normative elements of immunity are not the only basis on which the non-applicability of immunity can be established; the non-applicability can be based on other elements outside that institution which, as has been noted above, derive from the international legal order as a whole. While the non-applicability of immunity must be established following an inductive method in the first case, it may be established following a deductive method in the second. Both methods must be duly taken into consideration in the present report.

176. The methodological considerations mentioned above must be considered in addressing the bases of limitations and exceptions, which are analysed on the chapter below.

IV. Instances in which the immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction does not apply

177. In light of the analysis presented supra, the present chapter is intended to identify the scope of the limitations or exceptions to immunity from two perspectives: (a) determining the concrete areas in which such exceptions might operate; and (b) determining whether such exceptions can be invoked in general to both immunity ratione personae and immunity ratione materiae or only to the latter (section D). On the first point, the following scenarios will be examined in turn: international crimes (section A); harm caused in the territory of the forum State (section B); corruption (section C); and draft article 7 (section E), which deals with situations in which immunity is not applicable.

A. International crimes

178. As indicated earlier in the present report, the commission of international crimes has been central to the debate on limitations and exceptions to the immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction, owing undoubtedly to two factors: the connection between international crimes and jus cogens, on the one hand, and the inevitable comparison between immunity and the fight against impunity, on the other. The importance of international crimes in the debate on exceptions to immunity is also related to and influenced by the process of institutionalization of international criminal law that has been taking place since the end of the twentieth century, as reflected mainly in the establishment of international criminal courts or tribunals.

179. The practice analysed above shows how national courts have in some way addressed international crimes in the context of immunity. Although varied, the practice reveals a clear trend towards considering the commission of international crimes as a bar to the application of the immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction, either because such crimes are not considered official acts, or because they are considered an exception to immunity, owing to their gravity or to the fact that they undermine values and principles recognized by the international community as a whole. On the other hand, although national courts have sometimes recognized immunity from foreign criminal jurisdiction for international crimes, it must be remembered that they always did so in the context of immunity ratione personae, and only in exceptional circumstances did they do so with regard to immunity ratione materiae. In any event, it is worth noting that international criminal courts or tribunals have never recognized the immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction in the exercise of their own jurisdiction.

180. Consequently, it may be possible to conclude prima facie that contemporary international law recognizes a limitation or exception to the immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction in situations where the State official is suspected of committing an international crime, even though some publicists take the opposite view.[317] There are also a few practical examples where national courts have recognized the immunity of officials from criminal jurisdiction, including in cases where they were suspected of committing international crimes. In the section below, we analyse the connection between international crimes and the immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction, from two separate perspectives: (a) the existence of an international custom marking the contours of such limitation or exception; and (b) the systematic recognition of international crimes as a limitation or exception to immunity. Although both scenarios are closely related, they are treated separately in the present report for the sake of clarity. This sub-section will conclude with a review of the international crimes that might constitute a limitation or exception to the exercise of immunity.

1. Limitation or exception based on the commission of international crimes as a customary norm

181. Although the analysis of practice in chapter II supra, which focuses on but is not limited to national legislative and judicial practice, shows that international crimes tend to be considered a limitation or exception to the exercise of foreign criminal jurisdiction, there are doubts as to whether such practice is sufficiently consistent and uniform to constitute a material element of an international custom. Some have also wondered whether such practice is accompanied by a sense of legal obligation that might constitute opinio juris. Others have pointed out that there is consistent international jurisprudence indicating that such an exception does not exist, and that international jurisprudence takes precedence over national jurisprudence in the identification of a custom whereby the commission of international crimes is considered a limitation or exception to immunity. In short, what is being called into question is the existence of a customary norm whereby international crimes are considered an exception or limitation to the immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction.[318]

182. Determining whether or not such a custom exists is no easy task, and the debate around that issue cannot be ignored. The analysis of the issue in the present report is necessary and useful, to the extent that it can affect the Commission's decision whether or not to include such a limitation or exception in the draft articles that it is currently developing. That decision is undoubtedly one of the most sensitive and difficult aspects of our work, yet it is also of the greatest interest to States and the international community as a whole.

[318] O'keefe, "An 'International Crime'". On the other hand, Pedretti Immunity of Heads of State …, pp. 57-98 conducted an interesting study which led her to conclude that such a custom exists.

183. It is useful to conduct this analysis in the light of the ongoing work of the Commission on the identification of custom, and especially in the light of the draft conclusions provisionally adopted by the Drafting Committee,[319] which the Commission took note of on first reading during the first part of the current session. The following elements that are relevant for the purposes of the present report may be deduced from the draft conclusions:

(a) To determine the existence of an international custom, it is necessary to ascertain whether there is a "general practice that is accepted as law (opinio juris)";[320]

(b) Relevant practice "is primarily the practice of States",[321] which "consists of conduct of the State, whether in the exercise of its executive, legislative, judicial or other functions";[322]

(c) Practice "may take a wide range of forms" and may, "under certain circumstances, include inaction".[323] The following forms are worth noting for our purposes: "diplomatic acts (…); conduct in connection with resolutions adopted by an international organization or at an intergovernmental conference; conduct in connection with treaties; (…); legislative and administrative acts; and decisions of national courts".[324]

(d) Account is to be taken of all available practice of a particular State, which is to be assessed as a whole,[325] considering that "there is no predetermined hierarchy among the various forms of practice";[326]

(e) In any case, practice "must be general, meaning that it must be sufficiently widespread and representative, as well as consistent";[327]

(f) For practice to constitute international custom, it "must be undertaken with a sense of legal right or obligation";[328]

(g) In assessing practice and opinio juris, "regard must be had to the overall context, the nature of the rule, and the particular circumstances in which […] each of the [two] constituent elements"[329] used to that end;

(h) "Decisions of international courts and tribunals, in particular of the International Court of Justice (…) are a subsidiary means for the determination" of customary norms,[330] but they do not constitute practice for the formulation of an international custom.[331]

[331] In this connection, see the manner in which draft conclusion 6, para. 2, draft conclusion 10, para.2, and draft conclusion 13, para. 2 refer to the role of the decisions of national courts and the limited manner in which draft conclusion 13, para.1 refers to the decisions of international courts and tribunals (ibid.).

184. In the light of these guidelines from the Commission, the Special Rapporteur considers that there are sufficient elements pointing to the existence of a customary norm that recognizes international crimes as a limitation or exception to immunity, for the following reasons:

(a) Despite the diversity of positions taken by national courts in the cases analysed supra, it is possible to identify a trend in favour of the exception, in particular but not limited to positions taken by national courts in the context of criminal jurisdiction;

(b) In cases where national courts have applied any form of limitation or exception based on the commission of international crimes, they have always done so in reference to the incompatibility of such crimes with existing norms or principles of contemporary international law; it is therefore possible to affirm that the decisions of national courts are based on the conviction that they are acting pursuant to international law and not in exercise of an absolute discretion, something that would hardly be compatible with the fulfilment of the judicial function. This conclusion is even more important for decisions taken by judicial bodies in countries which, at the time of the decision, did not have specific norms referring to the exercise of immunity, or in which, even when such norms existed, they did not refer expressly to a possible exception for international crimes. The conclusion is also important for cases where national courts exercised their jurisdiction without any reference to immunity in respect of specific State officials when they should have done so if they had considered it applicable, either because they referred to immunity in respect of other State officials (thereby recognizing such immunity), in the judgment in question, or because they had referred to said immunity in relation to international crimes allegedly committed by State officials in other judgments;

(c) The non-applicability of the immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction in cases involving the commission of international crimes is reflected not only in judicial practice, but also in national laws adopted over the last two decades, which have gradually expressly incorporated such limitation or exception into domestic laws;

(d) State practice outside the judicial and legislative arenas, in particular within international organizations, also shows that most take the position that international crimes constitute a limitation or exception to immunity, as reflected in particular in statements delivered by States in the Sixth Committee in connection with this topic and in the written contributions of States in response to questions from the Commission under the present topic;

(e) The existence of a limitation or exception to immunity based on the commission of international crimes has also been recognized in writings by publicists, which must be considered a "subsidiary means" of identification of custom. In this connection, the Institut de Droit international deserves special commendation, having referred to the existence of such exception in many of its resolutions since the beginning of the current century.

185. It should be noted, however, that some publicists and States have adduced critical arguments against the conclusions set out supra, including (a) that there is equally significant practice against the application of a limitation or exception to immunity based on the commission of international crimes; (b) that international jurisprudence, in particular the decisions of the International Court of Justice and the European Court of Human Rights, has not recognized the existence of a limitation or exception to immunity based on the commission of international crimes; and (c) that State practice which supposedly serves as the basis of a customary norm does not fit in the category of general practice, and is also not sufficiently consistent or representative. Although the importance of these arguments cannot be ignored or minimized, the Special Rapporteur feels that they should be assessed in a nuanced manner.

186. It should be noted that the first objection mentioned above is based on general practice which refers not only to the immunity of State officials, but also, and more importantly, to the immunity of the State. It is doubtful that such arguments might be considered relevant for the purposes of the current discussion because it is unlikely that they take into account the "overall context, the nature of the rule, and the particular circumstances"[332] of the means for determination mentioned supra.

187. Second, even though the decisions of the International Court of Justice and the European Court of Human Rights are of great importance in the international legal order, they can only be considered "subsidiary means" of determination of the existence of a practice accompanied by opinio juris that is relevant as evidence of a customary norm and can never be able to replace national courts in the process of formation of custom. Furthermore, the role of national courts is especially important for the topic under consideration, because immunity is always invoked before national courts and their decisions are an irrevocable element in ascertaining what a given State considers to be international law. As indicated supra, the decisions of the International Court of Justice and the European Court of Human Rights, which are usually cited as authorities, refer directly to State immunity and, when they refer to the immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction, they have limited scope (especially those of the International Court of Justice), since they concern immunity ratione personae exclusively.

188. Of greater value are the arguments relating to the non-general nature of the practice used to substantiate the existence of a limitation or exception to immunity. In that connection, it is the case that the decisions of national courts, domestic norms and other types of statements by States are limited in number and their content is sometimes not fully consistent or uniform. However, as the Commission itself has just recognized in its work on the identification of customary international law, the relevance of the volume of practice must be assessed in the light of the area in which it is found.[333] In the case at hand, that area is, of necessity, limited by the very nature of the acts to which it refers (international crimes), because, despite their gravity, these acts are carried out exclusively in international society. In addition, the limited number of national orders that allow proceedings to be brought for such crimes when committed on foreign soil or by foreign nationals also limits the volume of practice. It should be noted, however, that the coexistence of judgments that apply a form of limitation or exception alongside judgments that apply immunity even in the presence of international crimes is not entirely unrelated to the process of formation of international custom. Owing to its informal and spontaneous nature, that process allows for the coexistence of divergent practices, at least during the initial stages of formation of the norm, without jeopardizing the emergence thereof. Lastly, with regard to the non-representative nature of practice, it should be noted that manifestations of practice can be identified in various regional areas, and that calling into question the relationship between immunity and international crimes in a given regional area does not affect the applicability of the limitation or exception to any form of immunity, except for immunity from jurisdiction ratione personae. The debate that has been taking place in Africa over the past few years and mentioned supra,[334] is a good example thereof. In any event, even in a situation where there might be doubts as to the existence of a relevant general practice to give rise to an international custom, it does not seem possible under any circumstances to deny the existence of a clear trend that would reflect an emerging custom.

[333] On the "general" nature of practice, see the second report on the identification of international custom document A/CN.4/672, especially paras. 52-57.

189. Consequently, in the view of the Special Rapporteur, the commission of international crimes may indeed be considered a limitation or exception to State immunity from foreign criminal jurisdiction based on a norm of international customary law.

2. Systemic categorization of international crimes as an exception to immunity

190. Whether or not there is a customary norm defining international crimes as limitations or exceptions to immunity, a systemic analysis of the relationship between immunity and international crimes in contemporary international law shows that there are various arguments in favour of such a norm.

(a) Protection of the values of the international community as a whole: jus cogens and the fight against impunity

191. As stated previously, national judicial practice provides examples in which international crimes are treated as limitations or exceptions to immunity. In the first type of case, the commission of international crimes is not covered by immunity, since the acts in question cannot be characterized as acts performed in an official capacity. In the second type of case, the commission of international crimes would constitute an exception to immunity even where those crimes have been committed as part of a State policy or in connection with the performance of State activities and may therefore be deemed to be acts performed in an official capacity. At any rate, both types of case have the same outcome: the immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction cannot apply in the case of international crimes.

192. The reasons adduced in both cases are of a substantive nature and are linked to the characterization of international crimes as acts contrary to fundamental values, norms and legal principles of the international community. Ultimately, they are also linked to the assertion that such crimes violate jus cogens norms from which there can be no derogation. In both cases, the characterization of international crimes as constituting a limitation or exception to immunity is also connected with the obligations arising from the fact that the international community as a whole has identified impunity for the most serious international crimes as an undesirable phenomenon and therefore cooperates to eliminate it.

193. It is incontrovertible that international crimes are contrary to the fundamental values, norms and legal principles of the international community; this is admitted even by those who consider that immunity from foreign criminal jurisdiction can be applied in the case of international crimes. At any rate, this assertion constitutes the premise for the fight against impunity as one of the values and objectives of society and international law today. However, although this is evident and has not been called into question, the legal status of both assertions has been questioned, and the conclusion has been drawn that both represent mere values and trends that are not embodied in norms of international law. However, this questioning of their legal status is not supported by a systemic analysis of the phenomenon in the context of contemporary international law.

194. Although the concepts of impunity and the fight against impunity have an undeniable sociological dimension, it cannot be denied that both have also become legal concepts as a result of the development of international law since the Second World War. The fact that both concepts have taken on a legal dimension is a result of the consolidation of two major areas of contemporary international law: international human rights law and international criminal law.[335]

195. The concept of "impunity" has acquired a legal dimension because social values have taken on the character of legal norms. For the current purposes, this legal dimension has been added essentially through the proclamation under international human rights law and international humanitarian law of a set of obligations relating to rights that are inherent in human dignity both in times of war and in times of peace and which, if not respected, have legal effects both on the State and on individuals. Their effects can be felt first through the rules pertaining to the international responsibility that States may incur by violating human rights and the norms of international humanitarian law, and second through the definition of international crimes for which the perpetrators may incur individual criminal responsibility. Both cases are expressions of the generic concept of responsibility, which, in the field of human rights, international humanitarian law and international criminal law, is conveyed by the term "accountability". The concept of impunity, understood in negative terms as an expression of "unaccountability", stands in opposition to the legal concept of accountability and, like accountability, has a legal dimension.[336] Furthermore, the elements to which "accountability" is applied and [335] It is not surprising, therefore, that the relationship between immunity and international crimes, under both international criminal law and international human rights law, has been analysed in studies published in the past 20 years. In this connection, see Van Alebeek, The immunity of States… On the human rights component of the debate, see Stacy Humes-Schulz, "Limiting Sovereign Immunity in the Age of Human Rights", Harvard Human Rights Journal, vol. 21, No. 1 (Winter 2008), pp. 105-142; Jo Stigen "Which Immunity for Human Rights Atrocities?", in Chile Eboe-Osuji, ed., *Protecting Humanity. It should also be borne in mind that the report prepared by Lady Fox for the Institut de Droit International, which served as the basis for the adoption of the Naples resolution (2009), was entitled "The Fundamental Rights of the Person and the Immunity from Jurisdiction in International Law".

[336] On accountability and impunity, see Daniel W. Van Ness, "Accountability", in Jennifer J. Llewellyn and Daniel Philpott, eds., Restorative Justice, Reconciliation, and Peacebuilding (Oxford, Oxford University Press, 2014); Paul Craig, "Accountability", in Damian Chalmers and Anthony Arnull, eds., The Oxford Handbook of European Union Law (Oxford, Oxford University Press, 2015) (who has stated that accountability may have political, legal and financial elements); Ramesh Thakur and Peter Malcontent, eds., From Sovereign Impunity to International which are left unprotected as a result of "impunity" are also legal values: internationally recognized human rights, the essential norms for the protection of victims in situations of armed conflict and the prohibition of certain means and methods of combat. No one today would doubt that these values constitute norms of international law.

196. Furthermore, the concept of "the fight against impunity" has also taken on a legal dimension, in particular through the launch of mechanisms for international cooperation whose purpose initially was to determine the State's responsibility for the violation of the aforementioned norms and, more recently, has been to determine individual criminal responsibility. These mechanisms operate at the international level through the establishment of bodies of various kinds, including judicial bodies, for international human rights protection, and through the establishment of international criminal courts.

197. However, international cooperation is not limited to the establishment of international bodies and procedures. On the contrary, it should be noted that almost all the international treaties that institute systems for the protection of human rights impose on States the obligation to establish appropriate remedies for that purpose under their domestic law.[337] This is even clearer in the case of cooperation for the punishment of international crimes: under the standard model prior to the establishment of the international criminal courts or tribunals, it was left exclusively

The important role of accountability in the rule of law has been emphasized by the General Assembly. In the Declaration of the High-level Meeting of the General Assembly on the Rule of Law at the National and International Levels, States "commit to ensuring that impunity is not tolerated for genocide, war crimes and crimes against humanity or for violations of international humanitarian law and gross violations of human rights law, and that such violations are properly investigated and appropriately sanctioned, including by bringing the perpetrators of any crimes to justice, through national mechanisms or, where appropriate, regional or international mechanisms, in accordance with international law, and for this purpose (…) encourage States to strengthen national judicial systems and institutions" (para. 22) and "stress the importance of a comprehensive approach to transitional justice incorporating the full range of judicial and non-judicial measures to ensure accountability, serve justice, provide remedies to victims, promote healing and reconciliation, establish independent oversight of the security system and restore confidence in the institutions of the State and promote the rule of law. In this respect, [they] underline that truth-seeking processes, including those that investigate patterns of past violations of international human rights law and international humanitarian law and their causes and consequences, are important tools that can complement judicial processes" (para. 21) (General Assembly resolution 67/1 of 24 September 2012).

[337] At the international level, see the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, arts. 2, para. 3 (a), and 14 (see also general comment No. 32, adopted in 2007) [report of the Human Rights Committee, Official Records of the General Assembly, Sixty-second Session, Supplement No. 40, vol. At the regional level, see the European Convention on Human Rights, arts. 6 and 13; the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union, art. 47; the American Convention on Human Rights, arts. 8 and 25; and the African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights, art. 7. For its part, the Human Rights Council has affirmed the need to "ensure accountability, serve justice [and] provide remedies to victims": Human Rights Council resolution 27/3 on the Special Rapporteur on the promotion of truth, justice, reparation and guarantees of non-recurrence (A/HRC/RES/27/3), 3 October 2014.

to States (and their courts) to punish international crimes through their domestic law and institutions. This model persists to a large extent today through the inclusion in international treaties relating to international crimes of an obligation on States to establish, under domestic law, the jurisdiction of their national courts to punish such crimes.[338]

198. Therefore, both the concept of impunity and the concept of the fight against impunity have an unequivocal legal dimension under both international law and States' domestic law. The fact that both terms are polysemous and have a clear sociological meaning does not deprive them of their legal dimension or limit them to being merely non-legal or metalegal concepts.

199. The legal nature of these concepts is also reflected in the link between them and jus cogens norms. Suffice it to say that it is generally accepted that many of these norms recognizing human rights or prohibiting certain conduct are unequivocally peremptory norms. For the current purposes, this applies particularly to the crime of genocide, crimes against humanity, the most serious war crimes and torture, which are commonly referred to as violations of peremptory norms. It should also be borne in mind that the Commission itself has characterized them as such in its previous work on the law of treaties, the draft Code of Crimes against the Peace and Security of Mankind and the articles on responsibility of States for internationally wrongful acts. Since international crimes constitute violations of peremptory norms of international law, it is not surprising that some national courts have held that this fact is sufficient to conclude that the immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction does not apply in cases in which international crimes have been committed. This explains why article 27 of the Rome Statute states that official capacity and national and international immunities cannot be invoked before the International Criminal Court and therefore cannot be used as a mechanism of procedural defence to bar the Court from exercising its jurisdiction.

200. This understanding of jus cogens as the basis for waiving immunity has been accepted by many national courts and a considerable number of States, as shown in the analysis of practice set out in chapter II supra. However, it should be remembered that it was expressly rejected by the International Court of Justice in the Jurisdictional Immunities of the State case on the grounds that jus cogens norms and the norms governing State immunity are distinct sets of rules. Moreover, the European Court of Human Rights has used similar arguments to conclude that the State's immunity from civil jurisdiction is not waived in the case of acts of torture, which are nonetheless expressly recognized as violations of peremptory norms of international law.

201. With regard to the assessment of that judgment in terms of its impact on the definition of jus cogens norms — something which does not need to be addressed in the present context — [339] it should be noted that, in the judgment, the Court did not address the interpretative effect of this type of norm, a point of particular interest to which the Commission itself has drawn attention in the past. As the Commission has already stated, the conflict between primary norms, as in the case currently under consideration, should not necessarily be resolved by determining responsibility; it should be borne in mind that all jus cogens norms have an interpretative effect that allows possible contradictions to be resolved without the need to consider the issue in relation to the rules of responsibility.

202. This interpretative effect should be borne in mind when addressing the relationship between the immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction and international crimes. Thus, insofar as an international crime is a violation of a jus cogens norm, as is indisputably the case with regard to torture, this circumstance should be borne in mind by legal professionals in order to arrive at an interpretation that reconciles both norms. Such interpretations will have to be made on a case-by-case basis but, in principle, it would be possible to waive immunity from criminal jurisdiction either on the grounds that such crimes cannot be acts performed in an official capacity or on the grounds that immunity must be waived in certain particularly serious circumstances in which fundamental legal values of the international community are undermined.

203. Furthermore, it should be borne in mind that the conclusion of the International Court of Justice with regard to State immunity cannot be applied automatically and in all respects to the relationship between the immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction and jus cogens norms. As the Court stated in its 2012 judgment, there is no conflict between immunity and jus cogens because immunity is a procedural matter and jus cogens is substantive in nature. Therefore, the mere establishment of a bar to the exercise of jurisdiction does not prevent a State from incurring responsibility through another channel and, therefore, does not result in a derogation from the jus cogens norm; thus one of the essential characteristics of peremptory norms — namely the impossibility of derogating from them under any norm of international law apart from another jus cogens norm — is preserved.

204. Bearing in mind that the Court is referring to immunity from civil jurisdiction, a State's responsibility and, above all, the legal consequences thereof (restitution of a right, payment of compensation, payment of damages, etc.) may be determined through another channel, either domestic (the courts of the State that is alleged to bear civil responsibility) or international (international courts, where possible; exercise of diplomatic protection; arbitration; or negotiation, inter alia). Therefore, the Court's assertion that immunity is an exclusively procedural institution cannot be challenged in strictly legal terms.

Italy*: Back to Article 53?", Netherlands International Law Review, vol. 60, No. 1 (May 2013), pp. 1-25.

205. However, this conclusion cannot be applied absolutely to the type of immunity referred to in the present report. The immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction has two specific characteristics that must be borne in mind: (a) it is exercised before the criminal courts; and (b) it has the effect of blocking any legal action whose purpose is to determine individual criminal responsibility for a certain type of crime. Beginning with the second of these characteristics, it cannot be denied that the only way to determine such criminal responsibility and to produce the necessary outcomes (declaration of innocence or guilt and, where appropriate, imposition of a penalty) is through criminal proceedings, which cannot be replaced by any of the alternative mechanisms referred to in the previous paragraph, in particular arbitration, diplomatic protection or inter-State negotiation. Therefore, immunity will fully meet the criteria to be considered a "procedural bar" only where recourse can be had to a criminal law mechanism other than the courts of the forum State in order to determine the possible criminal responsibility of a State official, whether that mechanism be the criminal courts of the State of the official, a competent international criminal court or another national court which, through the application of special rules, is competent to try the State official without the possibility of immunity being claimed before that court. However, it cannot be absolutely guaranteed that proceedings may be brought before one of these alternative courts, since this will depend on many circumstances, such as the existence of special norms in the State of the official that prevent him or her from being tried, the absence of jurisdiction of the international court or the existence of treaty norms that unequivocally allow for the intervention of a third State. If none of these alternative courts can try the international crimes, the phenomenon that has already been analysed in chapter III, section A, supra arises: immunity from foreign criminal jurisdiction loses its exclusively procedural nature and acquires a substantive component, so that it becomes both a "procedural bar" and a "substantive bar". The judgment of the International Court of Justice in the Jurisdictional Immunities of the State case did not contemplate that possibility and, therefore, it is not possible to conclude that the Court's assertion that there is no conflict between immunity and jus cogens norms applies in the case of immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction in relation to the commission of international crimes.

(b) Access to justice and the right of victims to reparation

206. Closely related to the arguments set out in the preceding paragraphs is the assertion that applying immunity from jurisdiction in relation to international crimes constitutes a denial of victims' right of access to justice and to obtain reparation for the crimes they have endured.

207. Denial of the right of access to justice has traditionally been one of the arguments used to limit the scope of any form of immunity.[340] This right has, without doubt, the benefit of being a basic right without which the right to effective judicial protection and to a fair trial is meaningless.[341] However, as the European Court of Human Rights has stated,[342] the right of access to justice is subject to limitations and, in the case of the relationship between that right and immunity, requires a purposive approach, taking into account the fact that — by definition — immunity serves to "block" judicial proceedings and that it therefore necessarily entails a limitation on the right of access to justice.

208. Moreover, in the case of the immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction, the right of access to justice has some specific characteristics that should be duly taken into account. First, criminal proceedings will not necessarily be brought by those who were the victims of the crime and, the initiation of proceedings against officials of a third State for international crimes may be subject to certain limits established by national laws that allow the organs of the State to control the exercise of jurisdiction on the grounds, in principle, of defence of the State's public interests. Second, proceedings are not initiated solely in defence of the individual interests and rights of the victims, but also for the benefit of national and international public order, so as to ensure compliance with norms that are considered essential by the international community as a whole. Lastly, the purpose of the proceedings is precisely to determine individual criminal responsibility for the commission of international crimes, which can be achieved only through judicial channels, whether that be the courts of the forum State, the courts of the State of the official, or an international criminal court. In this context, it is no simple matter to determine what is meant by the right of access to justice and in what circumstances the right is not guaranteed because immunity from criminal jurisdiction applies, even in cases where international crimes have been committed.

209. It is clear that an individual's right of access to the courts in order to file a complaint or accusation regarding the commission of an international crime will be limited by the application of immunity. However, this right will also be compromised if criminal proceedings are initiated by the competent authorities of the State and those proceedings are stalled by the application of immunity. In order for this limitation to make immunity incompatible with the right of access to justice, it must, as stated by the European Court of Human Rights, amount to a loss of the right itself. In other words, there must be no other means of securing a court decision on whether or not an international crime has been committed and whether, if such a crime has been committed, the State official is criminally responsible for the crime. If no such remedy is available, immunity will not only have the effect of denying the right of access to justice but will also allow the perpetuation of a situation at the root of which is an act — the international crime — that is contrary to peremptory norms of international law. From this perspective, and in these very particular circumstances, the right of access to justice may constitute a sufficient legal basis to conclude that immunity from foreign criminal jurisdiction is inapplicable in the case of international crimes.

210. In the case of the right of victims of international crimes to reparation, it cannot be denied that this is one of the most advanced developments in contemporary international criminal law: the commission of international crimes cannot have as its sole consequence the punishment of the perpetrators of those crimes; there should also be a system of reparations for the harm caused to the victims. This dimension of criminal justice is present in the laws of a number of countries establishing the right to reparation of the victims of a crime. The right is exercised either as an outcome of the criminal proceedings themselves or as a result of civil proceedings for the sole purpose of obtaining reparation for the harm caused by the crime, whether or not a criminal judgment has been issued on the matter.

211. The right to reparation is also a familiar concept in international law. For example, there are decisions of various international bodies that recognize the right to reparation of victims of human rights violations and international crimes.[343] The right to reparation was even claimed before the International Court of Justice in the Jurisdictional Immunities of the State case, although the Court did not rule on that point.[344] In any case, the right to reparation of the victims of international crimes is expressly recognized in article 75 of the Rome Statute, which has led to significant institutional[345] and jurisprudential[346] developments.

212. However, the characterization of the right of victims to reparation as the basis for an exception to immunity in the case of international crimes requires a nuanced analysis that is to a large extent related to the ability to initiate legal action for compensation. In that context, it should be borne in mind that such a claim may be filed with the criminal or civil courts and, in civil cases, it is not dependent on a prior criminal conviction. In both cases, the victim's right to reparation has a different effect on the limitation or exception to immunity. It is clear that this should be borne in mind as a basis for a limitation or exception when reparation can be obtained only through criminal proceedings, which therefore become an essential condition for obtaining reparation. In this case, the effect that immunity may have on the victims' right to reparation supplements the argument referred to above on the substantive dimension of immunity from foreign criminal jurisdiction.

213. However, the conclusion is not so clear in cases where reparation can be obtained only through proceedings before the civil courts, since in such cases the alternative mechanisms referred to above may come into operation. Furthermore, in these cases there is a renewed risk of confusion between the immunity of the State official and the immunity of the State, which could be considered to bear subsidiary civil responsibility.

214. Consequently, irrespective of the debate on the right of victims to reparation, it does not appear possible to conclude that the right to reparation may constitute in and of itself an autonomous legal basis for an exception to the immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction. In any case, this does not prevent the right to reparation from being evaluated as a complementary legal argument in favour of such an exception. In that context, the practice of certain States is particularly relevant; for example, the United States and Canada recognize in their domestic law an exception to immunity from civil jurisdiction in the case of certain claims for damages arising from the commission of international crimes. At a different level, the work of the Institut de Droit International should also be borne in mind: in its resolution on universal civil jurisdiction with regard to reparation for international crimes, it proclaimed both the right of victims to reparation and the right to effective access to justice to claim reparation (art. 1, paras. 1 and 2).

(c) The obligation to prosecute international crimes

215. The gravity of international crimes has been reflected in the adoption of a number of treaties that impose on States parties the obligation to exercise jurisdiction over such crimes. This treaty obligation has been regarded by some authors as the legal basis for concluding that the commission of international crimes constitutes a limitation or exception to immunity,[347] with reference in some degree to the experience of the Pinochet case. Accordingly, the duty of States parties to establish their own jurisdiction over certain international crimes obliges them to exercise jurisdiction in respect of any person who has committed crimes covered by such treaties, with no possibility of applying immunity. In a sense, States parties have implicitly waived the right to exercise of immunity from foreign criminal jurisdiction in respect of such crimes.

216. This is an interesting interpretation that seeks to preserve the duty of national courts to prosecute international crimes without the need to affect the essential elements of immunity from jurisdiction, in particular the consideration of immunity as an autonomous right of the State, and without the need to give a view on the characterization of international crimes as acts performed in an official capacity. It also has the advantage of being based on a treaty obligation that binds both the forum State and the State of the official, thus obviating the need to debate whether or not there is a customary norm that serves as the basis for limitations or exceptions to immunity. However, its value as a basis for limitations or exceptions is limited, since it would apply only to international crimes governed by treaties and does not take into account the existence of other treaties that do not include the obligation to establish jurisdiction. However, above all it is difficult to reconcile with the model of the relationship between jurisdiction and immunity described above, in which immunity can be applied only in respect of a pre-existing jurisdiction and in which, therefore, it is not logical to maintain that immunity does not apply precisely because the State has previously established its jurisdiction with regard to international crimes. In any case, this argument has the value of underlining the important contribution that treaties governing the phenomenon of international crimes have made to the definition of limitations and exceptions to immunity from foreign criminal jurisdiction and of emphasizing the fact that limitations and exceptions to immunity may in some cases have a treaty basis.

217. In sum, the arguments that have been analysed above make it clear that there are sufficient grounds in contemporary international law to conclude that the commission of international crimes may constitute a limitation or exception to the immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction. In the Special Rapporteur's view, there are therefore grounds to include such a limitation or exception in the draft articles, whether or not it is concluded that international custom establishes such a limitation or exception.

3. International crimes that constitute a limitation or exception to immunity

218. In order to define a limitation or exception to immunity from foreign criminal jurisdiction, it is necessary to define the concept of "international crime" and to identify the criminal acts that may be included within that concept.

219. At the outset, it should be noted that the term "international crime" refers to criminal conduct that is of international concern, either because it is undertaken in an international context and has a transnational or transboundary dimension, or because it undermines international legal values, irrespective of where it occurs. In both cases, these crimes are subject to international regulation. The first category includes crimes such as piracy, drug trafficking, human trafficking, corruption and other forms of international organized crime. The second includes the crime of genocide, crimes against humanity, war crimes, the crime of aggression, torture, enforced disappearance and apartheid. Although both categories generally consist of crimes that undermine the values and interests of States and the international community, only the latter category can, strictly speaking, be considered to constitute "international crimes" or "crimes under international law" that undermine the fundamental legal values of the international community as a whole.

220. Furthermore, a review of the practice analysed in chapter II of the present report shows that there are very few crimes identified in national laws as constituting exceptions to immunity from foreign criminal jurisdiction. Similarly, there are very few national court decisions in which immunity was withheld in connection with the commission of any of the established international crimes. The same pattern may be discerned in treaty practice and the Commission's past work on other topics.

221. After analysing that practice, it is possible to conclude that international crimes that constitute a limitation or exception to the application of immunity are generally those which, in the view of the international community, can give rise to criminal proceedings in international criminal courts or tribunals, in particular the International Criminal Court. As a result, these crimes should be placed in the same category as the crime of genocide, crimes against humanity and war crimes.

222. On the other hand, it is difficult, for the purposes of the present report, to extend this characterization to the crime of aggression, even though it, too, is a crime that falls under the jurisdiction of the International Criminal Court. There are several reasons for this: the Court's jurisdiction over this crime is optional and not automatic, as is the case with the other international crimes; the Commission itself already indicated in the draft Code of Crimes against the Peace and Security of Mankind of 1996 that the crime of aggression must be entrusted primarily to international courts and tribunals, given the political implications it could have for the stability of relations between States; there are very few pieces of national criminal legislation that address this crime; and, lastly, there do not appear to be any cases of State practice in which the crime of aggression has been characterized as a limitation or an exception to the exercise of immunity, at either the legislative or the judicial level.

223. There is nothing to prevent the establishment, by means of a treaty, of an exception to immunity from foreign criminal jurisdiction in relation to the first category of international crimes identified above. However, their inclusion in the category of crimes that give rise to the definition of a custom-based limitation or exception is not supported by practice.

224. Finally, it must be borne in mind that the national case law that has given rise to the limitation or exception analysed in this section was derived primarily from a large number of torture cases. Although the crime of torture may, in principle, be considered to be included under the category of crimes against humanity, it will not always be possible to do so, especially when the acts of torture in question are not part of a plan or policy. Nevertheless, national courts have sometimes withheld immunity from jurisdiction in cases of torture in which this criterion has not always been met. Thus, in view of the seriousness of this crime and the fact that its prohibition has consistently been regarded as a jus cogens norm, it seems reasonable to include torture expressly among the international crimes that constitute a limitation or exception to the immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction. Enforced disappearances are in a similar situation, although State practice in relation to them is more limited. In any event, owing to its seriousness, torture has been characterized as a "crime under international law" in various treaties when it is committed in a grave or systematic fashion. Given these circumstances, it seems appropriate to include torture in the list of crimes under international law that constitute a limitation or exception to the immunity from the jurisdiction referred to in the present report.

B. "Territorial tort exception"

225. The "territorial tort exception" had its origin in the law of diplomatic immunities and was later extended to State immunity. It has been incorporated into all national laws governing immunity, with the exception of those of Pakistan, and into the United Nations Convention on Jurisdictional Immunities of States and Their Property. It can be considered that the content of this exception is described in article 12 of the Convention (see paragraph 27 supra).

226. As indicated by the Commission in its commentary to article 12, this exception is justified by the preferential nature of the jurisdiction of the State in whose territory the acts are carried out. In addition, it provides a remedy for individuals who have suffered harm as a result of acts committed by a State official and who would normally not have access to any other legal means of redress.[348] This exception was also analysed in the 2007 memorandum by the Secretariat[349] and in the second report of the Special Rapporteur, Mr. Kolodkin, who concluded that it could constitute an exception to immunity ratione materiae, provided that the acts were committed in the territory of the forum State by a foreign official who had been present in the territory of that State without the State's express consent for the discharge of his or her official functions.[350]

227. While the above-mentioned exception was intended to be applied mainly in the context of diplomatic relations and was later extended to the acts of agents and officials of international organizations and to the immunity of the State, it is certainly possible to find examples of State practice in which the courts of the forum State have relied on the "territorial tort exception" to conclude that immunity from jurisdiction is not applicable to the officials of a foreign State. These are cases in which the national courts have applied the territorial tort exception in relation to acts constituting injury, political assassination, espionage or sabotage committed in the territory of the forum State by officials of a foreign State.[351] In such cases, the courts have denied immunity, despite recognizing the person concerned as a State official and establishing a connection between the State of the official and the act in question.

228. In some cases, the courts have concluded that — in spite of everything — immunity would remain applicable, and justified that conclusion by characterizing the acts in question as acta jure imperii and immunity as the immunity of the State and not that of its officials. This was the case with the decision of the Irish court in McElhinney v. Ireland and that of the European Court of Human Rights on the same set of facts. Similarly, it is worth noting the case of Jurisdictional Immunities of the State, in which the International Court of Justice denied the claims of Italy with regard to the application of this exception, on the grounds that, because the acts that had caused the injury had been committed by the Nazi troops during an armed conflict, they should have been characterized as acta jure imperii.

Investigating judge of the German Federal Court,* England, [2011] EWHC2029 (Admin) (abduction and illegal transfer of a person in Germany) (this decision provides an interesting analysis of the issue of exceptions in paragraphs 86 to 101). The courts of Italy and Greece have also accepted this exception, in Ferrini v. Federal Republic of Germany, Italy, Court of Cassation, judgment of 11 March 2004, ILR vol. 128, p. 674, and Prefecture of Voiotia v. Federal Republic of Germany, Greece, Court of Cassation, judgment of 4 May 2000, ILR, vol. 129 513 (see judgment of the International Court of Justice in Jurisdictional Immunities of the State (Germany v. Italy: Greece intervening)). The International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia has also referred to this exception, in Prosecutor v. Tihomir Blaškić, case IT-95-14-AR108 bis, request of the Republic of Croatia for review of the decision of Trial Chamber II of 18 July 1997, Appeals Chamber judgment of 29 October 1997, para. 41.

229. In short, State practice, although limited, seems to be consistent in recognizing the application of this limitation or exception to the immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction. The Special Rapporteur considers that this conclusion, together with the importance to be accorded the principle of territoriality in this case, justifies the inclusion of the "territorial tort exception" as a limitation or exception to immunity from jurisdiction in the draft articles currently being formulated.

C. Corruption as a limitation or exception to immunity

230. As already mentioned in the Special Rapporteur's fourth report, immunity has sometimes been invoked before national courts in relation to certain forms of conduct which, even if they have the appearance of having been performed in an official capacity, were carried out in the exclusive interests of the State official in respect of whom the exercise of jurisdiction is sought. Immunity has also been invoked by State officials in the context of criminal proceedings concerning activities which are unrelated to the functions of the State (misappropriation of funds, money-laundering, etc.) but which are only capable of being performed because of the perpetrator's status as an official and which, moreover, usually cause economic harm to the State of the official. In such cases, the response of national courts has generally been to deny immunity.[352] Such activities constitute a broad category, which includes embezzlement, diversion and misappropriation of public funds, money-laundering and other manifestations of corruption.

231. It can be asserted in general terms that, in the light of the criteria established in the fourth report, all these cases do not involve acts that can be considered as having been carried out in an official capacity. In principle, therefore, there appears to be no need at present to analyse them from the perspective of limitations or exceptions. However, practice shows that, in a number of the cases, it was not easy to determine clearly whether the act concerned was official or private, in particular since the act in question was only capable of being performed because of the official status of its perpetrator and the latter's ability to take advantage of the State structure, sometimes by means of acts that were ostensibly official. Nevertheless, even in such cases, in which the boundaries are not clear, national courts have as a rule concluded that immunity is not applicable, relying in most cases on the intention of the perpetrators of the acts, namely to make use of their official position exclusively for their own benefit, thereby causing harm to the State of which they are, or were, officials. Such a scenario therefore constitutes a clear case of what has been characterized above as a limitation to immunity, since immunity cannot be invoked in such cases owing to the incompatibility of the alleged act that gives rise to the attempt to exercise jurisdiction with one of the normative elements of immunity.

232. This is particularly clear in respect of acts that may fall under the term "corruption", where the State official acts unlawfully (in contravention of his or her mandate), or ultra vires (beyond his or her mandate). As stated in the previous reports, the fact that the act performed by the official is unlawful does not necessarily mean that he or she is not covered by immunity, if it is possible to determine that the act in question, despite being unlawful, was performed in an official capacity, that is to say, in the performance of State duties. However, ultra vires acts cannot in principle be covered by immunity, since, by definition, they are presumed not to have been performed in the exercise of State duties and, consequently, can never have been performed in an official capacity.

233. However, these conclusions, while theoretically indisputable, raise a considerable number of questions, and must in any event be reached on a case-by-case basis by the competent national court. This introduces a certain degree of uncertainty into an area — corruption among public officials — which is a focus of great concern for States, as demonstrated by the conclusion of international treaties dealing with this serious issue at both the global and the regional levels. Although such treaties do not generally refer to the question of immunity for the purpose of precluding its application in corruption cases involving foreign public officials, they have established a set of principles whose central aim is to ensure that State jurisdiction can be exercised effectively in order to suppress such conduct.[353]

234. Consequently, taking into account judicial practice and the fact that the suppression of corruption at the national and international levels constitutes a key objective of international cooperation,[354] it might be appropriate to include in the

V; and African Union Convention on Preventing and Combating Corruption, arts. 13, 15, 18 and 19.

[354] In a development closely related to the present report, it should be noted that the African Union has included corruption among the crimes within the jurisdiction of the International Criminal Law Section of the African Court of Justice and Human Rights. On a more general level, international concern about corruption and the need to combat it has been reflected in various activities undertaken by the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD) and the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime. The General Assembly has affirmed the need for a zero-tolerance approach to corruption, including within the United Nations itself, emphasizing that "the zero-tolerance approach to fraudulent acts and corruption (…) is indispensable for the strengthening of accountability at all levels" (General Assembly resolution 70/255 of 1 April 2016: Progress towards an accountability system in the United Nations Secretariat, para. 4). This concern has also been reflected in the literature. draft articles a provision that expressly defines corruption as a limitation or exception to the immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction.

D. Limitations and exceptions to immunity ratione personae and immunity ratione materiae

235. Having identified the circumstances that might constitute a limitation or exception to immunity, it is necessary to determine if they are generally applicable to all types of immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction (ratione personae and ratione materiae) or only to one (ratione materiae). The goal is to determine whether or not Heads of State, Heads of Government and Ministers for Foreign Affairs, during their term of office, are affected by the limitations or exceptions to immunity analysed above.

236. In making such a determination, it is important to bear in mind three considerations: (a) the way in which this matter has been approached in practice; (b) the purpose of, and the property protected by, immunity ratione personae and immunity ratione materiae; and (c) the differences between the normative elements of each of these types of immunity, in particular the temporal element. The substantive content of each limitation or exception analysed does not provide the information necessary to reach a decision as to the applicability or non-applicability of said limitation or exception to each type of immunity. In essence, crimes under international law, corruption and harm caused to persons and property are of the same gravity irrespective of who committed them.

237. Having said that, practice shows that national courts have generally recognized the immunity of Heads of State, Heads of Government and Ministers for Foreign Affairs in all circumstances, without taking into consideration the possible existence of one of the limitations or exceptions examined supra. This is especially patent in the case of international crimes, where national courts have generally recognized the immunity of the members of the troika. Moreover, such immunity has been recognized at the highest jurisdictional levels; indeed, even when a court of first instance has ruled that immunity is not applicable in the case of an international crime, the higher courts have overturned said decision and concluded that immunity is applicable.[355] Similarly, it has not been possible to find cases in which a national court has declared non-applicable the immunity of a Head of State, a Head of Government or a Minister for Foreign Affairs during his or her term of office on the grounds of the territorial tort exception or acts of corruption, with the sole exception, in the latter case, of the ruling of the Court of Appeal of Paris in the Teodoro Nguema Obiang Mangue case.

Derecho UC, 2009, pp. 319-339.

[355] See the case of Gaddafi before the French courts cited in chap. II, sect. D supra).

238. National laws that provide for limitations or exceptions to immunity for international crimes generally do not apply said limitations or exceptions in respect of members of the troika during their term of office. Furthermore, national laws that do not distinguish between Heads of State, Heads of Government and Ministers for Foreign Affairs and other State officials with regard to exceptions to immunity generally do so for the sole purpose of cooperating with the International Criminal Court. Only the laws of Burkina Faso, the Comoros, Ireland, Mauritius and South Africa appear to contemplate an exception in cases of international crimes law which apply to all State officials, regardless of rank.[356]

239. In addition, the International Court of Justice has stated expressly that there exists a customary norm which recognizes the complete or absolute immunity of Ministers for Foreign Affairs, which is also applicable to Heads of State and Heads of Government, and which allows no exception, not even for the commission of the most serious crimes, such as genocide, crimes against humanity and war crimes. This limitation of the exception to immunity ratione materiae based on the commission of international crimes is also supported by the majority of publicists, especially the Institut de Droit international, as seen in its 2009 resolution.

240. Therefore, it has not been possible to determine, on the basis of practice, the existence of a customary rule that allows for the application of limitations or exceptions to immunity ratione personae, or to identify a trend in favour of such a rule. On the other hand, the limitations and exceptions to the immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction do apply to State officials in the context of immunity ratione materiae.

241. This limitation cannot, however, be construed as a form of immunity. That said, it is important to recall that immunity ratione personae is of a highly temporal nature, as established in draft article 4, which was provisionally adopted by the Commission in 2013. Pursuant to that provision, following the end of their term of office, former Heads of State, former Heads of Government and former Ministers for Foreign Affairs enjoy immunity ratione materiae in relation to acts carried out in their official capacity during their term of office. Following the end of their term of office, therefore, they are wholly subject to the regime of immunity ratione materiae, including the limitations and exceptions thereto. In other words, the exclusion of Heads of State, Heads of Government and Ministers for Foreign Affairs from the regime of limitations and exceptions to immunity is of a temporal nature, owing primarily to the role that they play as representatives of the State in international affairs.

242. Nevertheless, it is true that in specific circumstances, the exclusion may be permanent rather than temporary, especially in the case of monarchs, who are in office for life and who cannot be removed from office, and Heads of State and Government who, for various reasons, become mandate-holders for life. Although in these cases limitations and exceptions to immunity are also non-applicable, it would be useful to recommend that the States concerned consider the possibility of lifting the immunity of their officials when requested, especially in the case of the most serious international crimes. Nevertheless, this recommendation will need to be analysed in the sixth report, in the context of the procedural aspects of immunity.

[356] See chap. II, sect. B supra.

E. Draft article

243. On the basis of the analysis undertaken in this fifth report, a draft article on the limitations and exceptions to immunity from foreign criminal jurisdiction is proposed below. In addition to the arguments developed above, the Special Rapporteur considered a number of other points when formulating the draft article.

244. Firstly, the distinction between limitations and exceptions, while useful in terms of methodology, had been controversial in normative terms, especially as a result of the discrepancies in the characterization of a particular act as a limitation or an exception in line with the analysis supra; this is especially true in the case of international crimes. The Commission was faced with a similar situation when formulating its draft articles on jurisdictional immunities of States and their property. At that time, the Commission opted for a cautious formulation which avoided the terms "limitation" and "exception" and instead generically referred to "proceedings in which [...] immunity cannot be invoked". The Special Rapporteur has used the same formulation in the draft article proposed in the present report.

245. Secondly, the draft article does not cover waivers of immunity by the State of an official. Owing to its highly procedural nature, this issue should be dealt with in the sixth report which, according to the programme of work initially proposed by the Special Rapporteur, will be prepared once the substantive issues have been addressed. Taking such an approach to waivers is consistent not only with the study carried out by the Secretariat but also with the third report of Special Rapporteur Kolodkin; it is also in line with the Commission's approach in preparing its draft articles on jurisdictional immunities of States and their property.

246. Thirdly, it is recognized that nothing prevents States from establishing, by means of international treaties, circumstances in which immunity from foreign criminal jurisdiction is not applicable. This has already occurred in practice and is fully consistent with treaty law. Therefore, a specific reference to this possibility has been included in the proposed draft article. For the same reason, a specific reference to the duty to cooperate with international criminal courts or tribunals has also been included.

247. Lastly, the Special Rapporteur wishes to underscore that the application of this draft article should be understood in the light of the procedural rules on the application of immunity that may be established in the future. Although such rules would not change the substantive content of the draft article with regard to the identification of situations in which immunity does not apply, it will be possible at such time to establish specific procedural conditions with a view to ensuring the observance of all the procedural safeguards that protect both States and individuals. However, it does not appear necessary at this time to introduce a specific reference to this issue in the draft article.

248. Bearing these considerations in mind, the Special Rapporteur proposes the following draft article:

Draft article 7
Crimes in respect of which immunity does not apply

1. Immunity shall not apply in relation to the following crimes:

(i) Genocide, crimes against humanity, war crimes, torture and enforced disappearances;

(ii) Corruption-related crimes;

(iii) Crimes that cause harm to persons, including death and serious injury, or to property, when such crimes are committed in the territory of the forum State and the State official is present in said territory at the time that such crimes are committed.

2. Paragraph 1 shall not apply to persons who enjoy immunity ratione personae during their term of office.

3. Paragraphs 1 and 2 are without prejudice to:

(i) Any provision of a treaty that is binding on both the forum State and the State of the official, under which immunity would not be applicable;

(ii) The obligation to cooperate with an international court or tribunal which, in each case, requires compliance by the forum State.

VI. Future workplan

249. Following the programme of work initially proposed by the Special Rapporteur, her sixth report will address the procedural aspects of immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction. It will also revisit the concepts of jurisdiction and immunity originally proposed by the Special Rapporteur in her second report. These concepts will have to be analysed from a procedural perspective with a view to identifying, in particular, the acts specific to the investigation and prosecution of a given crime in respect of which immunity is applicable.

250. The analysis of the procedural aspects of immunity is the last issue included in the initial programme of work; therefore, the Commission will be in a position to conclude its consideration of the topic and adopt the draft articles on first reading in 2017. Consequently, after the period required for States to submit written comments, the Commission will be able to review any such comments and the Special Rapporteur's proposals in 2019 and, as appropriate, proceed to the final adoption of the draft articles on second reading.

251. In any event, this workplan is subject to the decisions that will be adopted in the next quinquennium by the Commission members to be elected by the General Assembly in November 2016.

THE COURT,

composed as above,

after deliberation,

delivers the following Judgment:

1. On 17 October 2000 the Democratic Republic of the Congo (hereinafter referred to as "the Congo") filed in the Registry of the Court an Application instituting proceedings against the Kingdom of Belgium (hereinafter referred to as "Belgium") in respect of a dispute concerning an "international arrest warrant issued on 11 April 2000 by a Belgian investigating judge . . . against the Minister for Foreign Affairs in office of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, Mr. Abdulaye Yerodia Ndombasi".

In that Application the Congo contended that Belgium had violated the "principle that a State may not exercise its authority on the territory of another State", the "principle of sovereign equality among all Members of the United Nations, as laid down in Article 2, paragraph 1, of the Charter of the United Nations", as well as "the diplomatic immunity of the Minister for Foreign Affairs of a sovereign State, as recognized by the jurisprudence of the Court and following from Article 41, paragraph 2, of the Vienna Convention of 18 April 1961 on Diplomatic Relations".

In order to found the Court's jurisdiction the Congo invoked in the aforementioned Application the fact that "Belgium ha[d] accepted the jurisdiction of the Court and, in so far as may be required, the [aforementioned] Application signifie[d] acceptance of that jurisdiction by the Democratic Republic of the Congo".

2. Pursuant to Article 40, paragraph 2, of the Statute, the Application was forthwith communicated to the Government of Belgium by the Registrar; and, in accordance with paragraph 3 of that Article, all States entitled to appear before the Court were notified of the Application.

3. Since the Court included upon the Bench no judge of the nationality of either of the Parties, each Party proceeded to exercise the right conferred by Article 31, paragraph 3, of the Statute to choose a judge ad hoc to sit in the case; the Congo chose Mr. Sayeman Bula-Bula, and Belgium Ms Christine Van den Wyngaert.

4. On 17 October 2000, the day on which the Application was filed, the Government of the Congo also filed in the Registry of the Court a request for the indication of a provisional measure based on Article 41 of the Statute of the Court. At the hearings on that request, Belgium, for its part, asked that the case be removed from the List.

By Order of 8 December 2000 the Court, on the one hand, rejected Belgium's request that the case be removed from the List and, on the other, held that the circumstances, as they then presented themselves to the Court, were not such as to require the exercise of its power under Article 41 of the Statute to indicate provisional measures. In the same Order, the Court also held that "it [was] desirable that the issues before the Court should be determined as soon as possible" and that "it [was] therefore appropriate to ensure that a decision on the Congo's Application be reached with all expedition"

5. By Order of 13 December 2000, the President of the Court, taking account of the agreement of the Parties as expressed at a meeting held with their Agents on 8 December 2000, fixed time-limits for the filing of a Memorial by the Congo and of a Counter-Memorial by Belgium, addressing both issues of jurisdiction and admissibility and the merits. By Orders of 14 March 2001 and 12 April 2001, these time-limits, taking account of the reasons given by the Congo and the agreement of the Parties, were successively extended. The Memorial of the Congo was filed on 16 May 2001 within the time-limit thus finally prescribed.

6. By Order of 27 June 2001, the Court, on the one hand, rejected a request

by Belgium for authorization, in derogation from the previous Orders of the President of the Court, to submit preliminary objections involving suspension of the proceedings on the merits and, on the other, extended the time-limit prescribed in the Order of 12 April 2001 for the filing by Belgium of a Counter-Memorial addressing both questions of jurisdiction and admissibility and the merits. The Counter-Memorial of Belgium was filed on 28 September 2001 within the time-limit thus extended.

7. Pursuant to Article 53, paragraph 2, of the Rules, the Court, after ascertaining the views of the Parties, decided that copies of the pleadings and documents annexed would be made available to the public at the opening of the oral proceedings.

8. Public hearings were held from 15 to 19 October 2001, at which the Court heard the oral arguments and replies of:

For the Congo: H.E. Mr. Jacques Masangu-a-Mwanza,
H.E. Mr. Ngele Masudi,
Maître Kosisaka Kombe,
Mr. François Rigaux,
Ms Monique Chemillier-Gendreau,
Mr. Pierre d'Argent.

For Belgium: Mr. Jan Devadder,
Mr. Daniel Bethlehem,
Mr. Eric David.

9. At the hearings, Members of the Court put questions to Belgium, to which replies were given orally or in writing, in accordance with Article 61, paragraph 4, of the Rules of Court. The Congo provided its written comments on the reply that was given in writing to one of these questions, pursuant to Article 72 of the Rules of Court.

10. In its Application, the Congo formulated the decision requested in the following terms:

> "The Court is requested to declare that the Kingdom of Belgium shall annul the international arrest warrant issued on 11 April 2000 by a Belgian investigating judge, Mr. Vandermeersch, of the Brussels Tribunal de première instance against the Minister for Foreign Affairs in office of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, Mr. Abdulaye Yerodia Ndombasi, seeking his provisional detention pending a request for extradition to Belgium for alleged crimes constituting 'serious violations of international humanitarian law', that warrant having been circulated by the judge to all States, including the Democratic Republic of the Congo, which received it on 12 July 2000."

11. In the course of the written proceedings, the following submissions were presented by the Parties:

On behalf of the Government of the Congo,

in the Memorial:

> "In light of the facts and arguments set out above, the Government of the Democratic Republic of the Congo requests the Court to adjudge and declare that:

ICC-02/05-01/09-370-Anx1 16-07-2018 169/1408 RH PT OA2

1. by issuing and internationally circulating the arrest warrant of 11 April 2000 against Mr. Abdulaye Yerodia Ndombasi, Belgium committed a violation in regard to the DRC of the rule of customary international law concerning the absolute inviolability and immunity from criminal process of incumbent foreign ministers;
2. a formal finding by the Court of the unlawfulness of that act constitutes an appropriate form of satisfaction, providing reparation for the consequent moral injury to the DRC;
3. the violation of international law underlying the issue and international circulation of the arrest warrant of 11 April 2000 precludes any State, including Belgium, from executing it;
4. Belgium shall be required to recall and cancel the arrest warrant of 11 April 2000 and to inform the foreign authorities to whom the warrant was circulated that, following the Court's Judgment, Belgium renounces its request for their co-operation in executing the unlawful warrant."

On behalf of the Government of Belgium,

in the Counter-Memorial:

"For the reasons stated in Part II of this Counter-Memorial, Belgium requests the Court, as a preliminary matter, to adjudge and declare that the Court lacks jurisdiction in this case and/or that the application by the Democratic Republic of the Congo against Belgium is inadmissible.

If, contrary to the preceding submission, the Court concludes that it does have jurisdiction in this case and that the application by the Democratic Republic of the Congo is admissible, Belgium requests the Court to reject the submissions of the Democratic Republic of the Congo on the merits of the case and to dismiss the application."

12. At the oral proceedings, the following submissions were presented by the Parties:

On behalf of the Government of the Congo,

"In light of the facts and arguments set out during the written and oral proceedings, the Government of the Democratic Republic of the Congo requests the Court to adjudge and declare that:

1. by issuing and internationally circulating the arrest warrant of 11 April 2000 against Mr. Abdulaye Yerodia Ndombasi, Belgium committed a violation in regard to the Democratic Republic of the Congo of the rule of customary international law concerning the absolute inviolability and immunity from criminal process of incumbent foreign ministers; in so doing, it violated the principle of sovereign equality among States;
2. a formal finding by the Court of the unlawfulness of that act constitutes an appropriate form of satisfaction, providing reparation for the consequent moral injury to the Democratic Republic of the Congo;
3. the violations of international law underlying the issue and international circulation of the arrest warrant of 11 April 2000 preclude any State, including Belgium, from executing it;
4. Belgium shall be required to recall and cancel the arrest warrant of 11 April 2000 and to inform the foreign authorities to whom the warrant was circulated that Belgium renounces its request for their co-operation in executing the unlawful warrant."

On behalf of the Government of Belgium,

"For the reasons stated in the Counter-Memorial of Belgium and in its oral submissions, Belgium requests the Court, as a preliminary matter, to adjudge and declare that the Court lacks jurisdiction in this case and/or that the Application by the Democratic Republic of the Congo against Belgium is inadmissible.

If, contrary to the submissions of Belgium with regard to the Court's jurisdiction and the admissibility of the Application, the Court concludes that it does have jurisdiction in this case and that the Application by the Democratic Republic of the Congo is admissible, Belgium requests the Court to reject the submissions of the Democratic Republic of the Congo on the merits of the case and to dismiss the Application."

* * *

13. On 11 April 2000 an investigating judge of the Brussels Tribunal de première instance issued "an international arrest warrant in absentia" against Mr. Abdulaye Yerodia Ndombasi, charging him, as perpetrator or co-perpetrator, with offences constituting grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions of 1949 and of the Additional Protocols thereto, and with crimes against humanity.

At the time when the arrest warrant was issued Mr. Yerodia was the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Congo.

14. The arrest warrant was transmitted to the Congo on 7 June 2000, being received by the Congolese authorities on 12 July 2000. According to Belgium, the warrant was at the same time transmitted to the International Criminal Police Organization (Interpol), an organization whose function is to enhance and facilitate cross-border criminal police co-operation worldwide; through the latter, it was circulated internationally.

15. In the arrest warrant, Mr. Yerodia is accused of having made various speeches inciting racial hatred during the month of August 1998. The crimes with which Mr. Yerodia was charged were punishable in Belgium under the Law of 16 June 1993 "concerning the Punishment of Grave Breaches of the International Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949 and of Protocols I and II of 8 June 1977 Additional Thereto", as amended by the Law of 10 February 1999 "concerning the Punishment of Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law" (hereinafter referred to as the "Belgian Law").

Article 7 of the Belgian Law provides that "The Belgian courts shall have jurisdiction in respect of the offences provided for in the present Law, wheresoever they may have been committed". In the present case, according to Belgium, the complaints that initiated the proceedings as a result of which the arrest warrant was issued emanated from 12 individuals all resident in Belgium, five of whom were of Belgian nationality. It is not contested by Belgium, however, that the alleged acts to which the arrest warrant relates were committed outside Belgian territory, that Mr. Yerodia was not a Belgian national at the time of those acts, and that Mr. Yerodia was not in Belgian territory at the time that the arrest warrant was issued and circulated. That no Belgian nationals were victims of the violence that was said to have resulted from Mr. Yerodia's alleged offences was also uncontested.

Article 5, paragraph 3, of the Belgian Law further provides that "[i]mmunity attaching to the official capacity of a person shall not prevent the application of the present Law".

16. At the hearings, Belgium further claimed that it offered "to entrust the case to the competent authorities [of the Congo] for enquiry and possible prosecution", and referred to a certain number of steps which it claimed to have taken in this regard from September 2000, that is, before the filing of the Application instituting proceedings. The Congo for its part stated the following: "We have scant information concerning the form [of these Belgian proposals]." It added that "these proposals . . . appear to have been made very belatedly, namely after an arrest warrant against Mr. Yerodia had been issued".

17. On 17 October 2000, the Congo filed in the Registry an Application instituting the present proceedings (see paragraph 1 above), in which the Court was requested "to declare that the Kingdom of Belgium shall annul the international arrest warrant issued on 11 April 2000". The Congo relied in its Application on two separate legal grounds. First, it claimed that "[t]he universal jurisdiction that the Belgian State attributes to itself under Article 7 of the Law in question" constituted a

> "[v]iolation of the principle that a State may not exercise its authority on the territory of another State and of the principle of sovereign equality among all Members of the United Nations, as laid down in Article 2, paragraph 1, of the Charter of the United Nations".

Secondly, it claimed that "[t]he non-recognition, on the basis of Article 5 . . . of the Belgian Law, of the immunity of a Minister for Foreign Affairs in office" constituted a "[v]iolation of the diplomatic immunity of the Minister for Foreign Affairs of a sovereign State, as recognized by the jurisprudence of the Court and following from Article 41, paragraph 2, of the Vienna Convention of 18 April 1961 on Diplomatic Relations".

18. On the same day that it filed its Application instituting proceedings, the Congo submitted a request to the Court for the indication of a provisional measure under Article 41 of the Statute of the Court. During the hearings devoted to consideration of that request, the Court was informed that in November 2000 a ministerial reshuffle had taken place in the Congo, following which Mr. Yerodia had ceased to hold office as Minister for Foreign Affairs and had been entrusted with the portfolio of Minister of Education. Belgium accordingly claimed that the Congo's Application had become moot and asked the Court, as has already been recalled, to remove the case from the List. By Order of 8 December 2000, the Court rejected both Belgium's submissions to that effect and also the Congo's request for the indication of provisional measures (see paragraph 4 above).

19. From mid-April 2001, with the formation of a new Government in the Congo, Mr. Yerodia ceased to hold the post of Minister of Education. He no longer holds any ministerial office today.

20. On 12 September 2001, the Belgian National Central Bureau of Interpol requested the Interpol General Secretariat to issue a Red Notice in respect of Mr. Yerodia. Such notices concern individuals whose arrest is requested with a view to extradition. On 19 October 2001, at the public sittings held to hear the oral arguments of the Parties in the case, Belgium informed the Court that Interpol had responded on 27 September 2001 with a request for additional information, and that no Red Notice had yet been circulated.

21. Although the Application of the Congo originally advanced two separate legal grounds (see paragraph 17 above), the submissions of the Congo in its Memorial and the final submissions which it presented at the end of the oral proceedings refer only to a violation "in regard to the . . . Congo of the rule of customary international law concerning the absolute inviolability and immunity from criminal process of incumbent foreign ministers" (see paragraphs 11 and 12 above).

22. In their written pleadings, and in oral argument, the Parties addressed issues of jurisdiction and admissibility as well as the merits (see paragraphs 5 and 6 above). In this connection, Belgium raised certain objections which the Court will begin by addressing.

23. The first objection presented by Belgium reads as follows:

> "That, in the light of the fact that Mr. Yerodia Ndombasi is no longer either Minister for Foreign Affairs of the [Congo] or a minister occupying any other position in the . . . Government [of the Congo], there is no longer a 'legal dispute' between the Parties within the meaning of this term in the Optional Clause Declarations of the Parties and that the Court accordingly lacks jurisdiction in this case."

24. Belgium does not deny that such a legal dispute existed between the Parties at the time when the Congo filed its Application instituting proceedings, and that the Court was properly seised by that Application. However, it contends that the question is not whether a legal dispute existed at that time, but whether a legal dispute exists at the present time. Belgium refers in this respect inter alia to the Northern Cameroons case, in which the Court found that it "may pronounce judgment only in connection with concrete cases where there exists at the time of the adjudication an actual controversy involving a conflict of legal interests between the parties" (I.C.J. Reports 1963, pp. 33-34), as well as to the Nuclear Tests cases (Australia v. France) (New Zealand v. France), in which the Court stated the following: "The Court, as a court of law, is called upon to resolve existing disputes between States . . . The dispute brought before it must therefore continue to exist at the time when the Court makes its decision" (I.C.J. Reports 1974, pp. 270-271, para. 55; p. 476, para. 58). Belgium argues that the position of Mr. Yerodia as Minister for Foreign Affairs was central to the Congo's Application instituting proceedings, and emphasizes that there has now been a change of circumstances at the very heart of the case, in view of the fact that Mr. Yerodia was relieved of his position as Minister for Foreign Affairs in November 2000 and that, since 15 April 2001, he has occupied no position in the Government of the Congo (see paragraphs 18 and 19 above). According to Belgium, while there may still be a difference of opinion between the Parties on the scope and content of international law governing the immunities of a Minister for Foreign Affairs, that difference of opinion has now become a matter of abstract, rather than of practical, concern. The result, in Belgium's view, is that the case has become an attempt by the Congo to "[seek] an advisory opinion from the Court", and no longer a "concrete case" involving an "actual controversy" between the Parties, and that the Court accordingly lacks jurisdiction in the case.

25. The Congo rejects this objection of Belgium. It contends that there is indeed a legal dispute between the Parties, in that the Congo claims that the arrest warrant was issued in violation of the immunity of its Minister for Foreign Affairs, that that warrant was unlawful ab initio, and that this legal defect persists despite the subsequent changes in the position occupied by the individual concerned, while Belgium maintains that the issue and circulation of the arrest warrant were not contrary to international law. The Congo adds that the termination of Mr. Yerodia's official duties in no way operated to efface the wrongful act and the injury that flowed from it, for which the Congo continues to seek redress.

26. The Court recalls that, according to its settled jurisprudence, its jurisdiction must be determined at the time that the act instituting proceedings was filed. Thus, if the Court has jurisdiction on the date the case is referred to it, it continues to do so regardless of subsequent events. Such events might lead to a finding that an application has subsequently become moot and to a decision not to proceed to judgment on the merits, but they cannot deprive the Court of jurisdiction (see Nottebohm, Preliminary Objection, Judgment, I.C.J. Reports 1953, p. 122; Right of Passage over Indian Territory, Preliminary Objections, Judgment, I.C.J. Reports 1957, p. 142; Questions of Interpretation and Application of the 1971 Montreal Convention arising from the Aerial Incident at Lockerbie (Libyan Arab Jamahiriya v. United Kingdom), Preliminary Objections, Judgment, I.C.J. Reports 1998, pp. 23-24, para. 38; and Questions of Interpretation and Application of the 1971 Montreal Convention arising from the Aerial Incident at Lockerbie (Libyan Arab Jamahiriya v. United States of America), Preliminary Objections, Judgment, I.C.J. Reports 1998, p. 129, para. 37).

27. Article 36, paragraph 2, of the Statute of the Court provides:

> "The States parties to the present Statute may at any time declare that they recognize as compulsory ipso facto and without special agreement, in relation to any other State accepting the same obligation, the jurisdiction of the Court in all legal disputes concerning:
>
> (a) the interpretation of a treaty;
> (b) any question of international law;
> (c) the existence of any fact which, if established, would constitute a breach of an international obligation;

On 17 October 2000, the date that the Congo's Application instituting these proceedings was filed, each of the Parties was bound by a declaration of acceptance of compulsory jurisdiction, filed in accordance with the above provision: Belgium by a declaration of 17 June 1958 and the Congo by a declaration of 8 February 1989. Those declarations contained no reservation applicable to the present case.

Moreover, it is not contested by the Parties that at the material time there was a legal dispute between them concerning the international lawfulness of the arrest warrant of 11 April 2000 and the consequences to be drawn if the warrant was unlawful. Such a dispute was clearly a legal dispute within the meaning of the Court's jurisprudence, namely "a disagreement on a point of law or fact, a conflict of legal views or of interests between two persons" in which "the claim of one party is positively opposed by the other" (Questions of Interpretation and Application of the 1971 Montreal Convention arising from the Aerial Incident at Lockerbie (Libyan Arab Jamahiriya v. United Kingdom), Preliminary Objections, Judgment, I.C.J. Reports 1998, p. 17, para. 22; and Questions of Interpretation and Application of the 1971 Montreal Convention arising from the Aerial Incident at Lockerbie (Libyan Arab Jamahiriya v. United States of America), Preliminary Objections, Juagment, I.C.J. Reports 1998, pp. 122-123, para. 21).

28. The Court accordingly concludes that at the time that it was seised of the case it had jurisdiction to deal with it, and that it still has such jurisdiction. Belgium's first objection must therefore be rejected.

* *

29. The second objection presented by Belgium is the following:

> "That in the light of the fact that Mr. Yerodia Ndombasi is no longer either Minister for Foreign Affairs of the [Congo] or a minister occupying any other position in the . . Government [of the Congo], the case is now without object and the Court should accordingly decline to proceed to judgment on the merits of the case."

30. Belgium also relies in support of this objection on the Northern Cameroons case, in which the Court considered that it would not be a proper discharge of its duties to proceed further in a case in which any judgment that the Court might pronounce would be "without object" (I.C.J. Reports 1963, p. 38), and on the Nuclear Tests cases, in which the Court saw "no reason to allow the continuance of proceedings which it knows are bound to be fruitless" (I.C.J. Reports 1974, p. 271, para. 58; p. 477, para. 61). Belgium maintains that the declarations requested by the Congo in its first and second submissions would clearly fall within the principles enunciated by the Court in those cases, since a judgment of the Court on the merits in this case could only be directed towards the clarification of the law in this area for the future, or be designed to reinforce the position of one or other Party. It relies in support of this argument on the fact that the Congo does not allege any material injury and is not seeking compensatory damages. It adds that the issue and transmission of the arrest warrant were not predicated on the ministerial status of the person concerned, that he is no longer a minister, and that the case is accordingly now devoid of object.

31. The Congo contests this argument of Belgium, and emphasizes that the aim of the Congo — to have the disputed arrest warrant annulled and to obtain redress for the moral injury suffered — remains unachieved at the point in time when the Court is called upon to decide the dispute. According to the Congo, in order for the case to have become devoid of object during the proceedings, the cause of the violation of the right would have had to disappear, and the redress sought would have to have been obtained.

32. The Court has already affirmed on a number of occasions that events occurring subsequent to the filing of an application may render the application without object such that the Court is not called upon to give a decision thereon (see Questions of Interpretation and Application of the 1971 Mont- real Convention arising from the Aerial Incident at Lockerbie (Libyan Arab Jamahiriya v. United Kingdom), Preliminary Objections, Judgment, I.C.J. Reports 1998, p. 26, para. 46; and Questions of Interpretation and Application of the 1971 Montreal Convention arising from the Aerial Incident at Lockerbie (Libyan Arab Jamahiriya v. United States of America), Preliminary Objections, Judgment, I.C.J. Reports 1998, p. 131, para. 45).

However, it considers that this is not such a case. The change which has occurred in the situation of Mr. Yerodia has not in fact put an end to the dispute between the Parties and has not deprived the Application of its object. The Congo argues that the arrest warrant issued by the Belgian judicial authorities against Mr. Yerodia was and remains unlawful. It asks the Court to hold that the warrant is unlawful, thus providing redress for the moral injury which the warrant allegedly caused to it. The Congo also continues to seek the cancellation of the warrant. For its part, Belgium contends that it did not act in violation of international law and it disputes the Congo's submissions. In the view of the Court, it follows from the foregoing that the Application of the Congo is not now without object and that accordingly the case is not moot. Belgium's second objection must accordingly be rejected.

33. The third Belgian objection is put as follows:

> "That the case as it now stands is materially different to that set out in the [Congo]'s Application instituting proceedings and that the Court accordingly lacks jurisdiction in the case and/or that the application is inadmissible."

34. According to Belgium, it would be contrary to legal security and the sound administration of justice for an applicant State to continue proceedings in circumstances in which the factual dimension on which the Application was based has changed fundamentally, since the respondent State would in those circumstances be uncertain, until the very last moment, of the substance of the claims against it. Belgium argues that the prejudice suffered by the respondent State in this situation is analogous to the situation in which an applicant State formulates new claims during the course of the proceedings. It refers to the jurisprudence of the Court holding inadmissible new claims formulated during the course of the proceedings which, had they been entertained, would have transformed the subject of the dispute originally brought before it under the terms of the Application (see Fisheries Jurisdiction (Spain v. Canada), Jurisdiction of the Court, Judgment, I.C.J. Reports 1998, pp. 447-448, para. 29). In the circumstances, Belgium contends that, if the Congo wishes to maintain its claims, it should be required to initiate proceedings afresh or, at the very least, apply to the Court for permission to amend its initial Application.

35. In response, the Congo denies that there has been a substantial amendment of the terms of its Application, and insists that it has presented no new claim, whether of substance or of form, that would have transformed the subject-matter of the dispute. The Congo maintains that it has done nothing through the various stages in the proceedings but "condense and refine" its claims, as do most States that appear before the Court, and that it is simply making use of the right of parties to amend their submissions until the end of the oral proceedings.

36. The Court notes that, in accordance with settled jurisprudence, it "cannot, in principle, allow a dispute brought before it by application to be transformed by amendments in the submissions into another dispute which is different in character" (Société commerciale de Belgique, Judgment, 1939, P.C.I.J., Series A/B, No. 78, p. 173; cf. Military and Paramilitary Activities in and against Nicaragua (Nicaragua v. United States of America), Jurisdiction and Admissibility, Judgment, I.C.J. Reports 1984, p. 427, para. 80; see also Certain Phosphate Lands in Nauru (Nauru v. Australia), Preliminary Objections, Judgment, I.C.J. Reports 1992, pp. 264-267, in particular paras. 69 and 70). However, the Court considers that in the present case the facts underlying the Application have not changed in a way that produced such a transformation in the dispute brought before it. The question submitted to the Court for decision remains whether the issue and circulation of the arrest warrant by the Belgian judicial authorities against a person who was at that time the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Congo were contrary to international law. The Congo's final submissions arise "directly out of the question which is the subject-matter of that Application" (Fisheries Jurisdiction (Federal Republic of Germany v. Iceland), Merits, Judgment, I.C.J. Reports 1974, p. 203, para. 72; see also Temple of Preah Vihear, Merits, Judgment, I.C.J. Reports 1962, p. 36).

In these circumstances, the Court considers that Belgium cannot validly maintain that the dispute brought before the Court was transformed in a way that affected its ability to prepare its defence, or that the requirements of the sound administration of justice were infringed. Belgium's third objection must accordingly be rejected.

* *

37. The fourth Belgian objection reads as follows:

tected has failed to exhaust local remedies, and that the Court accordingly lacks jurisdiction in the case and/or that the application is inadmissible."

38. In this respect, Belgium accepts that, when the case was first instituted, the Congo had a direct legal interest in the matter, and was asserting a claim in its own name in respect of the alleged violation by Belgium of the immunity of the Congo's Foreign Minister. However, according to Belgium, the case was radically transformed after the Application was filed, namely on 15 April 2001, when Mr. Yerodia ceased to be a member of the Congolese Government. Belgium maintains that two of the requests made of the Court in the Congo's final submissions in practice now concern the legal effect of an arrest warrant issued against a private citizen of the Congo, and that these issues fall within the realm of an action of diplomatic protection. It adds that the individual concerned has not exhausted all available remedies under Belgian law a necessary condition before the Congo can espouse the cause of one of its nationals in international proceedings.

39. The Congo, on the other hand, denies that this is an action for diplomatic protection. It maintains that it is bringing these proceedings in the name of the Congolese State, on account of the violation of the immunity of its Minister for Foreign Affairs. The Congo further denies the availability of remedies under Belgian law. It points out in this regard that it is only when the Crown Prosecutor has become seised of the case file and makes submissions to the Chambre du conseil that the accused can defend himself before the Chambre and seek to have the charge dismissed.

40. The Court notes that the Congo has never sought to invoke before it Mr. Yerodia's personal rights. It considers that, despite the change in professional situation of Mr. Yerodia, the character of the dispute submitted to the Court by means of the Application has not changed: the dispute still concerns the lawfulness of the arrest warrant issued on 11 April 2000 against a person who was at the time Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Congo, and the question whether the rights of the Congo have or have not been violated by that warrant. As the Congo is not acting in the context of protection of one of its nationals, Belgium cannot rely upon the rules relating to the exhaustion of local remedies.

In any event, the Court recalls that an objection based on non-exhaustion of local remedies relates to the admissibility of the application (see Interhandel, Preliminary Objections, Judgment, I.C.J. Reports 1959, p. 26; Elettronica Sicula S.p.A. (ELSI), Judgment, I.C.J. Reports 1989, p. 42, para. 49). Under settled jurisprudence, the critical date for determining the admissibility of an application is the date on which it is filed (see Questions of Interpretation and Application of the 1971 Montreal Convention arising from the Aerial Incident at Lockerbie (Libyan Arab Jamahiriya v. United Kingdom), Preliminary Objections, Judgment, I.C.J. Reports 1998, pp. 25-26, paras. 43-44; and Questions of Interpretation and Application of the 1971 Montreal Convention arising from the Aerial Incident at Lockerbie (Libyan Arab Jamahiriya v. United States of America), Preliminary Objections, Judgment, I.C.J. Reports 1998, pp. 130-131, paras. 42-43). Belgium accepts that, on the date on which the Congo filed the Application instituting proceedings, the Congo had a direct legal interest in the matter, and was asserting a claim in its own name. Belgium's fourth objection must accordingly be rejected.

41. As a subsidiary argument, Belgium further contends that "[i]n the event that the Court decides that it does have jurisdiction in this case and that the application is admissible, . . . the non ultra petita rule operates to limit the jurisdiction of the Court to those issues that are the subject of the [Congo]'s final submissions". Belgium points out that, while the Congo initially advanced a twofold argument, based, on the one hand, on the Belgian judge's lack of jurisdiction, and, on the other, on the immunity from jurisdiction enjoyed by its Minister for Foreign Affairs, the Congo no longer claims in its final submissions that Belgium wrongly conferred upon itself universal jurisdiction in absentia. According to Belgium, the Congo now confines itself to arguing that the arrest warrant of 11 April 2000 was unlawful because it violated the immunity from jurisdiction of its Minister for Foreign Affairs, and that the Court consequently cannot rule on the issue of universal jurisdiction in any decision it renders on the merits of the case.

42. The Congo, for its part, states that its interest in bringing these proceedings is to obtain a finding by the Court that it has been the victim of an internationally wrongful act, the question whether this case involves the "exercise of an excessive universal jurisdiction" being in this connection only a secondary consideration. The Congo asserts that any consideration by the Court of the issues of international law raised by universal jurisdiction would be undertaken not at the request of the Congo but, rather, by virtue of the defence strategy adopted by Belgium, which appears to maintain that the exercise of such jurisdiction can "represent a valid counterweight to the observance of immunities".

43. The Court would recall the well-established principle that "it is the duty of the Court not only to reply to the questions as stated in the final submissions of the parties, but also to abstain from deciding points not included in those submissions" (Asylum, Judgment, I.C.J. Reports 1950, p. 402). While the Court is thus not entitled to decide upon questions not asked of it, the non ultra petita rule nonetheless cannot preclude the Court from addressing certain legal points in its reasoning. Thus in the present case the Court may not rule, in the operative part of its Judgment, on the question whether the disputed arrest warrant, issued by the Belgian investigating judge in exercise of his purported universal jurisdiction, complied in that regard with the rules and principles of international law governing the jurisdiction of national courts. This does not mean, however, that the Court may not deal with certain aspects of that question in the reasoning of its Judgment, should it deem this necessary or desirable.

* *

44. The Court concludes from the foregoing that it has jurisdiction to entertain the Congo's Application, that the Application is not without object and that accordingly the case is not moot and that the Application is admissible. Thus, the Court now turns to the merits of the case.

* * *

45. As indicated above (see paragraphs 41 to 43 above), in its Application instituting these proceedings, the Congo originally challenged the legality of the arrest warrant of 11 April 2000 on two separate grounds: on the one hand, Belgium's claim to exercise a universal jurisdiction and, on the other, the alleged violation of the immunities of the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Congo then in office. However, in its submissions in its Memorial, and in its final submissions at the close of the oral proceedings, the Congo invokes only the latter ground.

46. As a matter of logic, the second ground should be addressed only once there has been a determination in respect of the first, since it is only where a State has jurisdiction under international law in relation to a particular matter that there can be any question of immunities in regard to the exercise of that jurisdiction. However, in the present case, and in view of the final form of the Congo's submissions, the Court will address first the question whether, assuming that it had jurisdiction under international law to issue and circulate the arrest warrant of 11 April 2000, Belgium in so doing violated the immunities of the then Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Congo.

and to immunity from criminal process being "absolute or complete", that is to say, they are subject to no exception. Accordingly, the Congo contends that no criminal prosecution may be brought against a Minister for Foreign Affairs in a foreign court as long as he or she remains in office, and that any finding of criminal responsibility by a domestic court in a foreign country, or any act of investigation undertaken with a view to bringing him or her to court, would contravene the principle of immunity from jurisdiction. According to the Congo, the basis of such criminal immunity is purely functional, and immunity is accorded under customary international law simply in order to enable the foreign State representative enjoying such immunity to perform his or her functions freely and without let or hindrance. The Congo adds that the immunity thus accorded to Ministers for Foreign Affairs when in office covers all their acts, including any committed before they took office, and that it is irrelevant whether the acts done whilst in office may be characterized or not as "official acts".

48. The Congo states further that it does not deny the existence of a principle of international criminal law, deriving from the decisions of the Nuremberg and Tokyo international military tribunals, that the accused's official capacity at the time of the acts cannot, before any court, whether domestic or international, constitute a "ground of exemption from his criminal responsibility or a ground for mitigation of sentence". The Congo then stresses that the fact that an immunity might bar prosecution before a specific court or over a specific period does not mean that the same prosecution cannot be brought, if appropriate, before another court which is not bound by that immunity, or at another time when the immunity need no longer be taken into account. It concludes that immunity does not mean impunity.

49. Belgium maintains for its part that, while Ministers for Foreign Affairs in office generally enjoy an immunity from jurisdiction before the courts of a foreign State, such immunity applies only to acts carried out in the course of their official functions, and cannot protect such persons in respect of private acts or when they are acting otherwise than in the performance of their official functions.

50. Belgium further states that, in the circumstances of the present case, Mr. Yerodia enjoyed no immunity at the time when he is alleged to have committed the acts of which he is accused, and that there is no evidence that he was then acting in any official capacity. It observes that the arrest warrant was issued against Mr. Yerodia personally.

holders of high-ranking office in a State, such as the Head of State, Head of Government and Minister for Foreign Affairs, enjoy immunities from jurisdiction in other States, both civil and criminal. For the purposes of the present case, it is only the immunity from criminal jurisdiction and the inviolability of an incumbent Minister for Foreign Affairs that fall for the Court to consider.

52. A certain number of treaty instruments were cited by the Parties in this regard. These included, first, the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations of 18 April 1961, which states in its preamble that the purpose of diplomatic privileges and immunities is "to ensure the efficient performance of the functions of diplomatic missions as representing States". It provides in Article 32 that only the sending State may waive such immunity. On these points, the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations, to which both the Congo and Belgium are parties, reflects customary international law. The same applies to the corresponding provisions of the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations of 24 April 1963, to which the Congo and Belgium are also parties.

The Congo and Belgium further cite the New York Convention on Special Missions of 8 December 1969, to which they are not, however, parties. They recall that under Article 21, paragraph 2, of that Convention:

> "The Head of the Government, the Minister for Foreign Affairs and other persons of high rank, when they take part in a special mission of the sending State, shall enjoy in the receiving State or in a third State, in addition to what is granted by the present Convention, the facilities, privileges and immunities accorded by international law."

These conventions provide useful guidance on certain aspects of the question of immunities. They do not, however, contain any provision specifically defining the immunities enjoyed by Ministers for Foreign Affairs. It is consequently on the basis of customary international law that the Court must decide the questions relating to the immunities of such Ministers raised in the present case.

53. In customary international law, the immunities accorded to Ministers for Foreign Affairs are not granted for their personal benefit, but to ensure the effective performance of their functions on behalf of their respective States. In order to determine the extent of these immunities, the Court must therefore first consider the nature of the functions exercised by a Minister for Foreign Affairs. He or she is in charge of his or her Government's diplomatic activities and generally acts as its representative in international negotiations and intergovernmental meetings. Ambassadors and other diplomatic agents carry out their duties under his or her authority. His or her acts may bind the State represented, and there is a presumption that a Minister for Foreign Affairs, simply by virtue of that office, has full powers to act on behalf of the State (see, for example, Article 7, paragraph 2 (a), of the 1969 Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties). In the performance of these functions, he or she is frequently required to travel internationally, and thus must be in a position freely to do so whenever the need should arise. He or she must also be in constant communication with the Government, and with its diplomatic missions around the world, and be capable at any time of communicating with representatives of other States. The Court further observes that a Minister for Foreign Affairs, responsible for the conduct of his or her State's relations with all other States, occupies a position such that, like the Head of State or the Head of Government, he or she is recognized under international law as representative of the State solely by virtue of his or her office. He or she does not have to present letters of credence: to the contrary, it is generally the Minister who determines the authority to be conferred upon diplomatic agents and countersigns their letters of credence. Finally, it is to the Minister for Foreign Affairs that chargés d'affaires are accredited.

54. The Court accordingly concludes that the functions of a Minister for Foreign Affairs are such that, throughout the duration of his or her office, he or she when abroad enjoys full immunity from criminal jurisdiction and inviolability. That immunity and that inviolability protect the individual concerned against any act of authority of another State which would hinder him or her in the performance of his or her duties.

55. In this respect, no distinction can be drawn between acts performed by a Minister for Foreign Affairs in an "official" capacity, and those claimed to have been performed in a "private capacity", or, for that matter, between acts performed before the person concerned assumed office as Minister for Foreign Affairs and acts committed during the period of office. Thus, if a Minister for Foreign Affairs is arrested in another State on a criminal charge, he or she is clearly thereby prevented from exercising the functions of his or her office. The consequences of such impediment to the exercise of those official functions are equally serious, regardless of whether the Minister for Foreign Affairs was, at the time of arrest, present in the territory of the arresting State on an "official" visit or a "private" visit, regardless of whether the arrest relates to acts allegedly performed before the person became the Minister for Foreign Affairs or to acts performed while in office, and regardless of whether the arrest relates to alleged acts performed in an "official" capacity or a "private" capacity. Furthermore, even the mere risk that, by travelling to or transiting another State a Minister for Foreign Affairs might be exposing himself or herself to legal proceedings could deter the Minister from travelling internationally when required to do so for the purposes of the performance of his or her official functions.

56. The Court will now address Belgium's argument that immunities accorded to incumbent Ministers for Foreign Affairs can in no case protect them where they are suspected of having committed war crimes or crimes against humanity. In support of this position, Belgium refers in its Counter-Memorial to various legal instruments creating international criminal tribunals, to examples from national legislation, and to the jurisprudence of national and international courts.

Belgium begins by pointing out that certain provisions of the instruments creating international criminal tribunals state expressly that the official capacity of a person shall not be a bar to the exercise by such tribunals of their jurisdiction.

Belgium also places emphasis on certain decisions of national courts, and in particular on the judgments rendered on 24 March 1999 by the House of Lords in the United Kingdom and on 13 March 2001 by the Court of Cassation in France in the Pinochet and Qaddafi cases respectively, in which it contends that an exception to the immunity rule was accepted in the case of serious crimes under international law. Thus, according to Belgium, the Pinochet decision recognizes an exception to the immunity rule when Lord Millett stated that "[i]nternational law cannot be supposed to have established a crime having the character of a jus cogens and at the same time to have provided an immunity which is coextensive with the obligation it seeks to impose", or when Lord Phillips of Worth Matravers said that "no established rule of international law requires state immunity ratione materiae to be accorded in respect of prosecution for an international crime". As to the French Court of Cassation, Belgium contends that, in holding that, "under international law as it currently stands, the crime alleged [acts of terrorism], irrespective of its gravity, does not come within the exceptions to the principle of immunity from jurisdiction for incumbent foreign Heads of State", the Court explicitly recognized the existence of such exceptions.

57. The Congo, for its part, states that, under international law as it currently stands, there is no basis for asserting that there is any exception to the principle of absolute immunity from criminal process of an incumbent Minister for Foreign Affairs where he or she is accused of having committed crimes under international law.

In support of this contention, the Congo refers to State practice, giving particular consideration in this regard to the Pinochet and Qaddafi cases, and concluding that such practice does not correspond to that which Belgium claims but, on the contrary, confirms the absolute nature of the immunity from criminal process of Heads of State and Ministers for Foreign Affairs. Thus, in the Pinochet case, the Congo cites Lord Browne-Wilkinson's statement that "[t]his immunity enjoyed by a head of state in power and an ambassador in post is a complete immunity attached to the person of the head of state or ambassador and rendering him immune from all actions or prosecutions . . .". According to the Congo, the French Court of Cassation adopted the same position in its Qaddafi judgment, in affirming that "international custom bars the prosecution of incumbent Heads of State, in the absence of any contrary international provision binding on the parties concerned, before the criminal courts of a foreign State".

As regards the instruments creating international criminal tribunals and the latter's jurisprudence, these, in the Congo's view, concern only those tribunals, and no inference can be drawn from them in regard to criminal proceedings before national courts against persons enjoying immunity under international law.

58. The Court has carefully examined State practice, including national legislation and those few decisions of national higher courts, such as the House of Lords or the French Court of Cassation. It has been unable to deduce from this practice that there exists under customary international law any form of exception to the rule according immunity from criminal jurisdiction and inviolability to incumbent Ministers for Foreign Affairs, where they are suspected of having committed war crimes or crimes against humanity.

The Court has also examined the rules concerning the immunity or criminal responsibility of persons having an official capacity contained in the legal instruments creating international criminal tribunals, and which are specifically applicable to the latter (see Charter of the International Military Tribunal of Nuremberg, Art. 7; Charter of the International Military Tribunal of Tokyo, Art. 6; Statute of the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia, Art. 7, para. 2; Statute of the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda, Art. 6, para. 2; Statute of the International Criminal Court, Art. 27). It finds that these rules likewise do not enable it to conclude that any such an exception exists in customary international law in regard to national courts.

Finally, none of the decisions of the Nuremberg and Tokyo international military tribunals, or of the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia, cited by Belgium deal with the question of the immunities of incumbent Ministers for Foreign Affairs before national courts where they are accused of having committed war crimes or crimes against humanity. The Court accordingly notes that those decisions are in no way at variance with the findings it has reached above.

In view of the foregoing, the Court accordingly cannot accept Belgium's argument in this regard.

59. It should further be noted that the rules governing the jurisdiction of national courts must be carefully distinguished from those governing jurisdictional immunities: jurisdiction does not imply absence of immunity, while absence of immunity does not imply jurisdiction. Thus,

although various international conventions on the prevention and punishment of certain serious crimes impose on States obligations of prosecution or extradition, thereby requiring them to extend their criminal jurisdiction, such extension of jurisdiction in no way affects immunities under customary international law, including those of Ministers for Foreign Affairs. These remain opposable before the courts of a foreign State, even where those courts exercise such a jurisdiction under these conventions.

60. The Court emphasizes, however, that the immunity from jurisdiction enjoyed by incumbent Ministers for Foreign Affairs does not mean that they enjoy impunity in respect of any crimes they might have committed, irrespective of their gravity. Immunity from criminal jurisdiction and individual criminal responsibility are quite separate concepts. While jurisdictional immunity is procedural in nature, criminal responsibility is a question of substantive law. Jurisdictional immunity may well bar prosecution for a certain period or for certain offences; it cannot exonerate the person to whom it applies from all criminal responsibility.

61. Accordingly, the immunities enjoyed under international law by an incumbent or former Minister for Foreign Affairs do not represent a bar to criminal prosecution in certain circumstances.

First, such persons enjoy no criminal immunity under international law in their own countries, and may thus be tried by those countries' courts in accordance with the relevant rules of domestic law.

Secondly, they will cease to enjoy immunity from foreign jurisdiction if the State which they represent or have represented decides to waive that immunity.

Thirdly, after a person ceases to hold the office of Minister for Foreign Affairs, he or she will no longer enjoy all of the immunities accorded by international law in other States. Provided that it has jurisdiction under international law, a court of one State may try a former Minister for Foreign Affairs of another State in respect of acts committed prior or subsequent to his or her period of office, as well as in respect of acts committed during that period of office in a private capacity.

Fourthly, an incumbent or former Minister for Foreign Affairs may be subject to criminal proceedings before certain international criminal courts, where they have jurisdiction. Examples include the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia, and the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda, established pursuant to Security Council resolutions under Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter, and the future International Criminal Court created by the 1998 Rome Convention. The latter's Statute expressly provides, in Article 27, paragraph 2, that "[i]mmunities or special procedural rules which may attach to the official capacity of a person, whether under national or international law, shall not bar the Court from exercising its jurisdiction over such a person".

62. Given the conclusions it has reached above concerning the nature and scope of the rules governing the immunity from criminal jurisdiction enjoyed by incumbent Ministers for Foreign Affairs, the Court must now consider whether in the present case the issue of the arrest warrant of 11 April 2000 and its international circulation violated those rules. The Court recalls in this regard that the Congo requests it, in its first final submission, to adjudge and declare that:

> "[B]y issuing and internationally circulating the arrest warrant of 11 April 2000 against Mr. Abdulaye Yerodia Ndombasi, Belgium committed a violation in regard to the Democratic Republic of the Congo of the rule of customary international law concerning the absolute inviolability and immunity from criminal process of incumbent foreign ministers; in so doing, it violated the principle of sovereign equality among States."

63. In support of this submission, the Congo maintains that the arrest warrant of 11 April 2000 as such represents a "coercive legal act" which violates the Congo's immunity and sovereign rights, inasmuch as it seeks to "subject to an organ of domestic criminal jurisdiction a member of a foreign government who is in principle beyond its reach" and is fully enforceable without special formality in Belgium.

The Congo considers that the mere issuance of the warrant thus constituted a coercive measure taken against the person of Mr. Yerodia, even if it was not executed.

64. As regards the international circulation of the said arrest warrant, this, in the Congo's view, not only involved further violations of the rules referred to above, but also aggravated the moral injury which it suffered as a result of the opprobrium "thus cast upon one of the most prominent members of its Government". The Congo further argues that such circulation was a fundamental infringement of its sovereign rights in that it significantly restricted the full and free exercise, by its Minister for Foreign Affairs, of the international negotiation and representation functions entrusted to him by the Congo's former President. In the Congo's view, Belgium "[thus] manifests an intention to have the individual concerned arrested at the place where he is to be found, with a view to procuring his extradition". The Congo emphasizes moreover that it is necessary to avoid any confusion between the arguments concerning the legal effect of the arrest warrant abroad and the question of any responsibility of the foreign authorities giving effect to it. It points out in this regard that no State has acted on the arrest warrant, and that accordingly

"no further consideration need be given to the specific responsibility which a State executing it might incur, or to the way in which that responsibility should be related" to that of the Belgian State. The Congo observes that, in such circumstances, "there [would be] a direct causal relationship between the arrest warrant issued in Belgium and any act of enforcement carried out elsewhere".

With regard to the legal effects under Belgian law of the arrest warrant of 11 April 2000, Belgium contends that the clear purpose of the warrant was to procure that, if found in Belgium, Mr. Yerodia would be detained by the relevant Belgian authorities with a view to his prosecution for war crimes and crimes against humanity. According to Belgium, the Belgian investigating judge did, however, draw an explicit distinction in the warrant between, on the one hand, immunity from jurisdiction and, on the other hand, immunity from enforcement as regards representatives of foreign States who visit Belgium on the basis of an official invitation, making it clear that such persons would be immune from enforcement of an arrest warrant in Belgium. Belgium further contends that, in its effect, the disputed arrest warrant is national in character, since it requires the arrest of Mr. Yerodia if he is found in Belgium but it does not have this effect outside Belgium.

66. In respect of the legal effects of the arrest warrant outside Belgium, Belgium maintains that the warrant does not create any obligation for the authorities of any other State to arrest Mr. Yerodia in the absence of some further step by Belgium completing or validating the arrest warrant (such as a request for the provisional detention of Mr. Yerodia), or the issuing of an arrest warrant by the appropriate authorities in the State concerned following a request to do so, or the issuing of an Interpol Red Notice. Accordingly, outside Belgium, while the purpose of the warrant was admittedly "to establish a legal basis for the arrest of Mr. Yerodia . . . and his subsequent extradition to Belgium", the warrant had no legal effect unless it was validated or completed by some prior act "requiring the arrest of Mr. Yerodia by the relevant authorities in a third State". Belgium further argues that "[i]f a State had executed the arrest warrant, it might infringe Mr. [Yerodia's] criminal immunity", but that "the Party directly responsible for that infringement would have been that State and not Belgium".

67. The Court will first recall that the "international arrest warrant in absentia", issued on 11 April 2000 by an investigating judge of the Brussels Tribunal de première instance, is directed against Mr. Yerodia, stating that he is "currently Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, having his business address at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs in Kinshasa". The warrant states that Mr. Yerodia is charged with being "the perpetrator or co-perpetrator" of:

> "— Crimes under international law constituting grave breaches causing harm by act or omission to persons and property protected by the Conventions signed at Geneva on 12 August 1949 and by Additional Protocols I and II to those Conventions (Article 1, paragraph 3, of the Law of 16 June 1993, as amended by the Law of 10 February 1999 concerning the punishment of serious violations of international humanitarian law)
> — Crimes against humanity (Article 1, paragraph 2, of the Law of 16 June 1993, as amended by the Law of 10 February 1999 concerning the punishment of serious violations of international humanitarian law)."

The warrant refers to "various speeches inciting racial hatred" and to "particularly virulent remarks" allegedly made by Mr. Yerodia during "public addresses reported by the media" on 4 August and 27 August 1998. It adds:

> "These speeches allegedly had the effect of inciting the population to attack Tutsi residents of Kinshasa: there were dragnet searches, manhunts (the Tutsi enemy) and lynchings.
> The speeches inciting racial hatred thus are said to have resulted in several hundred deaths, the internment of Tutsis, summary executions, arbitrary arrests and unfair trials."

68. The warrant further states that "the position of Minister for Foreign Affairs currently held by the accused does not entail immunity from jurisdiction and enforcement". The investigating judge does, however, observe in the warrant that "the rule concerning the absence of immunity under humanitarian law would appear . . . to require some qualification in respect of immunity from enforcement" and explains as follows:

> "Pursuant to the general principle of fairness in judicial proceedings, immunity from enforcement must, in our view, be accorded to all State representatives welcomed as such onto the territory of Belgium (on 'official visits'). Welcoming such foreign dignitaries as official representatives of sovereign States involves not only relations between individuals but also relations between States. This implies that such welcome includes an undertaking by the host State and its various components to refrain from taking any coercive measures against its guest and the invitation cannot become a pretext for ensnaring the individual concerned in what would then have to be labelled a trap. In the contrary case, failure to respect this undertaking could give rise to the host State's international responsibility."

69. The arrest warrant concludes with the following order:

"We instruct and order all bailiffs and agents of public authority who may be so required to execute this arrest warrant and to conduct the accused to the detention centre in Forest;

We order the warden of the prison to receive the accused and to keep him (her) in custody in the detention centre pursuant to this arrest warrant;

We require all those exercising public authority to whom this warrant shall be shown to lend all assistance in executing it."

70. The Court notes that the issuance, as such, of the disputed arrest warrant represents an act by the Belgian judicial authorities intended to enable the arrest on Belgian territory of an incumbent Minister for Foreign Affairs on charges of war crimes and crimes against humanity. The fact that the warrant is enforceable is clearly apparent from the order given to "all bailiffs and agents of public authority . . . to execute this arrest warrant" (see paragraph 69 above) and from the assertion in the warrant that "the position of Minister for Foreign Affairs currently held by the accused does not entail immunity from jurisdiction and enforcement". The Court notes that the warrant did admittedly make an exception for the case of an official visit by Mr. Yerodia to Belgium, and that Mr. Yerodia never suffered arrest in Belgium. The Court is bound, however, to find that, given the nature and purpose of the warrant, its mere issue violated the immunity which Mr. Yerodia enjoyed as the Congo's incumbent Minister for Foreign Affairs. The Court accordingly concludes that the issue of the warrant constituted a violation of an obligation of Belgium towards the Congo, in that it failed to respect the immunity of that Minister and, more particularly, infringed the immunity from criminal jurisdiction and the inviolability then enjoyed by him under international law.

71. The Court also notes that Belgium admits that the purpose of the international circulation of the disputed arrest warrant was "to establish a legal basis for the arrest of Mr. Yerodia . . . abroad and his subsequent extradition to Belgium". The Respondent maintains, however, that the enforcement of the warrant in third States was "dependent on some further preliminary steps having been taken" and that, given the "inchoate" quality of the warrant as regards third States, there was no "infringe[ment of] the sovereignty of the [Congo]". It further points out that no Interpol Red Notice was requested until 12 September 2001, when Mr. Yerodia no longer held ministerial office.

The Court cannot subscribe to this view. As in the case of the warrant's issue, its international circulation from June 2000 by the Belgian authorities, given its nature and purpose, effectively infringed Mr. Yero-dia's immunity as the Congo's incumbent Minister for Foreign Affairs and was furthermore liable to affect the Congo's conduct of its international relations. Since Mr. Yerodia was called upon in that capacity to undertake travel in the performance of his duties, the mere international circulation of the warrant, even in the absence of "further steps" by Belgium, could have resulted, in particular, in his arrest while abroad. The Court observes in this respect that Belgium itself cites information to the effect that Mr. Yerodia, "on applying for a visa to go to two countries, [apparently] learned that he ran the risk of being arrested as a result of the arrest warrant issued against him by Belgium", adding that "[t]his, moreover, is what the [Congo] . . . hints when it writes that the arrest warrant 'sometimes forced Minister Yerodia to travel by roundabout routes'". Accordingly, the Court concludes that the circulation of the warrant, whether or not it significantly interfered with Mr. Yerodia's diplomatic activity, constituted a violation of an obligation of Belgium towards the Congo, in that it failed to respect the immunity of the incumbent Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Congo and, more particularly, infringed the immunity from criminal jurisdiction and the inviolability then enjoyed by him under international law.

* * *

72. The Court will now address the issue of the remedies sought by the Congo on account of Belgium's violation of the above-mentioned rules of international law. In its second, third and fourth submissions, the Congo requests the Court to adjudge and declare that:

> "A formal finding by the Court of the unlawfulness of [the issue and international circulation of the arrest warrant] constitutes an appropriate form of satisfaction, providing reparation for the consequent moral injury to the Democratic Republic of the Congo;
>
> The violations of international law underlying the issue and international circulation of the arrest warrant of 11 April 2000 preclude any State, including Belgium, from executing it;
> Belgium shall be required to recall and cancel the arrest warrant of 11 April 2000 and to inform the foreign authorities to whom the warrant was circulated that Belgium renounces its request for their co-operation in executing the unlawful warrant."

73. In support of those submissions, the Congo asserts that the termination of the official duties of Mr. Yerodia in no way operated to efface the wrongful act and the injury flowing from it, which continue to exist. It argues that the warrant is unlawful ab initio, that "[i]t is fundamentally flawed" and that it cannot therefore have any legal effect today. It points out that the purpose of its request is reparation for the injury caused, requiring the restoration of the situation which would in all probability have existed if the said act had not been committed. It states that, inasmuch as the wrongful act consisted in an internal legal instrument, only the "withdrawal" and "cancellation" of the latter can provide appropriate reparation.

The Congo further emphasizes that in no way is it asking the Court itself to withdraw or cancel the warrant, nor to determine the means whereby Belgium is to comply with its decision. It explains that the withdrawal and cancellation of the warrant, by the means that Belgium deems most suitable, "are not means of enforcement of the judgment of the Court but the requested measure of legal reparation/restitution itself". The Congo maintains that the Court is consequently only being requested to declare that Belgium, by way of reparation for the injury to the rights of the Congo, be required to withdraw and cancel this warrant by the means of its choice.

74. Belgium for its part maintains that a finding by the Court that the immunity enjoyed by Mr. Yerodia as Minister for Foreign Affairs had been violated would in no way entail an obligation to cancel the arrest warrant. It points out that the arrest warrant is still operative and that "there is no suggestion that it presently infringes the immunity of the Congo's Minister for Foreign Affairs". Belgium considers that what the Congo is in reality asking of the Court in its third and fourth final submissions is that the Court should direct Belgium as to the method by which it should give effect to a judgment of the Court finding that the warrant had infringed the immunity of the Congo's Minister for Foreign Affairs.

75. The Court has already concluded (see paragraphs 70 and 71) that the issue and circulation of the arrest warrant of 11 April 2000 by the Belgian authorities failed to respect the immunity of the incumbent Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Congo and, more particularly, infringed the immunity from criminal jurisdiction and the inviolability then enjoyed by Mr. Yerodia under international law. Those acts engaged Belgium's international responsibility. The Court considers that the findings so reached by it constitute a form of satisfaction which will make good the moral injury complained of by the Congo.

76. However, as the Permanent Court of International Justice stated in its Judgment of 13 September 1928 in the case concerning the Factory at Chorzów:

> "[t]he essential principle contained in the actual notion of an illegal act — a principle which seems to be established by international practice and in particular by the decisions of arbitral tribunals — is that reparation must, as far as possible, wipe out all the consequences of the illegal act and reestablish the situation which would, in all probability, have existed if that act had not been committed" (P.C.I.J., Series A, No. 17, p. 47).

In the present case, "the situation which would, in all probability, have existed if [the illegal act] had not been committed" cannot be re-established merely by a finding by the Court that the arrest warrant was unlawful under international law. The warrant is still extant, and remains unlawful, notwithstanding the fact that Mr. Yerodia has ceased to be Minister for Foreign Affairs. The Court accordingly considers that Belgium must, by means of its own choosing, cancel the warrant in question and so inform the authorities to whom it was circulated.

77. The Court sees no need for any further remedy: in particular, the Court cannot, in a judgment ruling on a dispute between the Congo and Belgium, indicate what that judgment's implications might be for third States, and the Court cannot therefore accept the Congo's submissions on this point.

Chapter VII
Immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction

A. Introduction

68. The Commission, at its fifty-ninth session (2007), decided to include the topic "Immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction" in its programme of work and appointed Mr. Roman A. Kolodkin as Special Rapporteur.[749] At the same session, the Commission requested the Secretariat to prepare a background study on the topic, which was made available to the Commission at its sixtieth session (2008).[750]

69. The Special Rapporteur submitted three reports. The Commission received and considered the preliminary report at its sixtieth session (2008) and the second and third reports at its sixty-third session (2011).[751] The Commission was unable to consider the topic at its sixty-first (2009) and sixty-second (2010) sessions.[752]

70. The Commission, at its sixty-fourth session (2012), appointed Ms. Concepción Escobar Hernández as Special Rapporteur to replace Mr. Kolodkin, who was no longer a member of the Commission.[753] The Commission received and considered the preliminary report of the Special Rapporteur at the same session (2012), her second report during the sixty-fifth session (2013), her third report during the sixty-sixth session (2014), her fourth report during the sixty-seventh session (2015) and her fifth report, in a partial debate, during the sixty-eighth session (2016).[754] On the basis of the draft articles proposed by the Special Rapporteur in the second, third and fourth reports, the Commission has thus far provisionally adopted six draft articles and commentaries thereto. Draft article 2 on the use of terms is still being developed.[755]

B. Consideration of the topic at the present session

71. The Commission had before it the fifth report of the Special Rapporteur analysing the question of limitations and exceptions to the immunity of State officials from foreign

[749] At its 2940th meeting, on 20 July 2007 (Official Records of the General Assembly, Sixty-second Session, Supplement No. 10 (A/62/10), para. 376). The General Assembly, in paragraph 7 of its resolution 62/66 of 6 December 2007, took note of the decision of the Commission to include the topic in its programme of work. The topic had been included in the long-term programme of work of the Commission during its fifty-eighth session (2006), on the basis of the proposal contained in annex A of the report of the Commission (Official Records of the General Assembly, Sixty-first Session, Supplement No. 10 (A/61/10), para. 257).

At its 3174th meeting, on 7 June 2013, the Commission received the report of the Drafting Committee and provisionally adopted draft articles 1, 3 and 4 and, at its 3193rd to 3196th meetings, on 6 and 7 August 2013, it adopted the commentaries thereto (ibid., Sixty-ninth Session, Supplement No. 10 (A/69/10), paras. 48-49). At its 3231st meeting, on 25 July 2014, the Commission received the report of the Drafting Committee and provisionally adopted draft articles 2 (e) and 5 and, at its 3240th to 3242nd meetings, on 6 and 7 August 2014, it adopted the commentaries thereto. At its 3329th meeting, on 27 July 2016, the Commission provisionally adopted draft articles 2, subparagraph (f), and 6, provisionally adopted by the Drafting Committee and taken note of by the Commission at its sixty-seventh session, and at its 3345th and 3346th meetings, on 11 August 2016, the Commission adopted the commentaries thereto (ibid., Seventy-first Session, Supplement No. 10 (A/71/10), paras. 194-195 and 250 and, ibid., Seventieth Session, Supplement No. 10 (A/70/10), para. 176).

criminal jurisdiction (A/CN.4/701), which it had begun to debate at its sixty-eighth session. The report addressed, in particular, the prior consideration by the Commission of the question of limitations and exceptions to the immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction, offered an analysis of relevant practice, addressed some methodological and conceptual questions related to limitations and exceptions, and considered instances in which the immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction would not apply. The Special Rapporteur drew the conclusion that it had not been possible to determine, on the basis of practice, the existence of a customary rule that allowed for the application of limitations or exceptions in respect of immunity ratione personae, or to identify a trend in favour of such a rule. On the other hand, she came to the conclusion that limitations and exceptions to the immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction did apply to State officials in the context of immunity ratione materiae. As a consequence of the analysis, the report contained a proposal for draft article 7 on crimes in respect of which immunity did not apply.[756]

72. At its sixty-eighth session, given that the report had not been available in all languages, the Commission underlined that the debate on the report would continue in order to be finalized at the present session. Accordingly, the Commission continued its debate on the fifth report at its 3360th to 3365th meetings, on 18, 19, 23, 24, 26 and 30 May 2017, respectively.

73. Following its debate on the report, the Commission, at its 3365th meeting, on 30 May 2017, decided to refer draft article 7, as contained in the Special Rapporteur's fifth report, to the Drafting Committee, taking into account the debate in the Commission.

74. At its 3378th meeting, on 20 July 2017, the Commission considered the report of the Drafting Committee and provisionally adopted draft article 7 (see section C.1 below). Provisional adoption was by recorded vote, with 21 votes in favour, 8 votes against and 1 abstention. The members present voted as follows:

77. Informal consultations on immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction, conducted by the Special Rapporteur, were held on 18 July 2017. The informal consultations were open-ended and their aim was to exchange views and share ideas on the procedural aspects of immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction, which will be the subject under consideration in the sixth report of the Special Rapporteur, to be submitted in 2018. The consultations were based on an informal concept paper on procedural provisions and safeguards prepared by the Special Rapporteur. At the 3378th meeting, on 20 July 2017, the Special Rapporteur informed the Commission on the development of the informal consultations.

1. Introduction by the Special Rapporteur of the fifth report

78. The Special Rapporteur recalled that the fifth report, on limitations and exceptions to immunities of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction, dealt with a subject that had been the subject of recurrent debate over the years in the Commission and in the Sixth

Committee, eliciting diverse, and often opposing, views. There was a general desire to proceed cautiously and prudently given the sensitivity of the subject and its importance for States. The report itself had been introduced at the sixty-eighth session of the Commission[757] and had been the subject of a partial debate.[758] The Special Rapporteur noted that, due to the change in composition of the Commission, and in the light of the comments and observations on the report at the sixty-eighth session of the Commission and in the Sixth Committee at the seventy-first session of the General Assembly, she considered it appropriate at the current session to make additional introductory remarks on the report. Accordingly, the Special Rapporteur gave a brief overview of the previous debates on the fifth report in the Commission and the Sixth Committee.

79. Commenting on the fifth report itself, she noted that it followed a similar methodology to previous reports, examining State practice, international jurisprudence, the prior work of the Commission and an analysis of domestic legislation for the present report. The report had also taken into account the information received from Governments in response to questions posed by the Commission and oral statements by States in the Sixth Committee. The Special Rapporteur underlined that the fifth report, like the previous reports, had to be read and understood together with the prior reports on the topic.

80. Building on her presentation at the previous session, which she considered to be an integral part of the prior reports considered by the Commission, the Special Rapporteur highlighted a number of ideas central to the report. First, she noted that the phrase "limitations and exceptions" echoed the different arguments put forward in practice for the non-application of immunity. The Special Rapporteur stressed that the distinction between limitations and exceptions, despite its theoretical and normative value for the systemic interpretation of the immunity regime, had no practical significance, as "limitations" or "exceptions" led to the same consequence, namely the non-application of the legal regime of the immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction in a particular case.

81. Second, the report addressed limitations and exceptions within the specific framework of immunity and within the context of the international legal system as a whole. In that regard, the Special Rapporteur underscored: (a) the interrelationship between immunity and jurisdiction, even though the two were different concepts; (b) the procedural nature of immunity; (c) the distinction between immunity of State officials and State immunity; and (d) the distinction between immunity from foreign criminal jurisdiction and immunity before international criminal courts and tribunals. The report further examined immunity from the point of view of international law as a normative system, in which immunity sought to guarantee respect for sovereign equality of States but had to be balanced against other important values of the international legal system.

82. Third, the report focused on the practice of States, which constituted the cornerstone of the Commission's work. The report examined to what extent practice revealed the existence of customary norms that could be codified, following the basic methodology in the Commission's work on the identification of customary international law. It also analysed whether there existed a trend towards progressive development of norms relating to immunity. Going beyond international jurisprudence and treaties, the report studied domestic legislation and decisions of domestic courts. The report also analysed the issues from a systemic perspective, thereby considering the regime of immunity in relation to other aspects of the contemporary international legal system, understood as a whole.

83. On those bases, the report concluded that it had not been possible to determine the existence of a customary rule that allowed for the application of limitations or exceptions in respect of immunity ratione personae, or to identify a trend in favour of such a rule. On the other hand, the report concluded that limitations and exceptions to the immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction were extant in the context of immunity ratione materiae. Although varied, the practice showed a clear trend towards considering the commission of international crimes as a bar to the application of immunity ratione materiae of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction, for the reason that such crimes did not constitute official acts, that the crimes concerned were grave or that they undermined the values and principles recognized by the international community as a whole.

84. Finally, the Special Rapporteur noted that the Commission should approach the topic of immunity from foreign criminal jurisdiction, and in particular the question of limitations and exceptions, from the perspectives of both codification and the progressive development of international law. The challenge for the Commission was to decide whether to support a developing trend in the field of immunity, or whether to halt such development.

85. The Special Rapporteur also made specific comments on the proposed draft article 7. The three paragraphs of the draft article sought to address, in an integral fashion, all the elements that defined the regime of limitations and exceptions to immunity.

86. Paragraph 1 identified crimes to which immunity would not apply. Following the model of the United Nations Convention on Jurisdictional Immunities of States and Their Property, the expression "does not apply" was used to capture both limitations and exceptions. The paragraph identified situations in which immunity did not apply by reference to the crimes over which jurisdiction was sought, namely in case of (a) international crimes; (b) crimes of corruption; and (c) the so-called "territorial tort" exception.

87. Paragraph 2 defined the scope of limitations and exceptions. It specified that the limitations and exceptions in paragraph 1 did not apply to the persons who enjoyed immunity ratione personae, namely Heads of State, Heads of Government and Ministers for Foreign Affairs. It emphasized, however, that the enjoyment of immunity ratione personae was time-bound, which meant that the limitations and exceptions to immunity would apply to the troika once they had left office.

88. Paragraph 3 contained a without-prejudice provision in respect of situations covered by special regimes. The first subparagraph related to instances in which immunity of officials was not applicable due to the existence of treaty relations between the States concerned. The second subparagraph covered cases in which immunity might be affected by a general obligation to cooperate with an international criminal court. Both of those situations stemmed from examples in practice.

89. With regard to the future work of the Commission on the topic, the Special Rapporteur indicated her intention to conduct informal consultations on various procedural matters relating to the topic, during the present session of the Commission. It was hoped that such consultations would further inform the content of her sixth report, to be submitted during the seventieth session of the Commission.

2. Summary of the debate

90. The debate at the present session was a continuation of the discussion on the fifth report, which had commenced at the sixty-eighth session of the Commission. The summary below should be read in combination with the summary of the topic in the report of the Commission on the work of its sixty-eighth session.

(a) General comments

91. Members commended the Special Rapporteur for her rich and well-documented fifth report, which offered a thoughtful analysis of State practice as reflected in treaties and domestic legislation, as well as in international and domestic case law. Members also recalled, with appreciation, the work by the former Special Rapporteur, as well as the study by the Secretariat. Members acknowledged the complex and contentious nature of the topic, in particular the question of limitations and exceptions. The comments made focused generally on methodological and conceptual issues raised in the fifth report, including on the methodology and treatment of State practice, the mandate of the Commission in the progressive development of international law and its codification, the regime of immunity in the international legal system as a whole, as well as the interrelationship between the question of limitations and exceptions and procedural aspects.

Methodology and treatment of State practice

92. Several members expressed their appreciation for the detailed and comprehensive analysis of State practice contained in the fifth report. Some members noted their support for the methodology of the Special Rapporteur and maintained that the report provided a firm foundation for the proposed draft article.

93. Other members stated that, while the discussion of practice was extensive, it remained unclear how it related to the specific limitations and exceptions contained in draft article 7. Some members also questioned whether the report, while not finding coherent practice against the non-applicability of immunity, contained sufficient evidence to support the limitations and exceptions to immunity that it proposed. It was noted that many of the examples cited in the report related to State immunity or immunity in civil proceedings, rather than criminal prosecutions. In the view of some members, the report selectively discussed cases that supported the establishment of limitations and exceptions to immunities, while ignoring evidence indicating the opposite. It was noted that the examples in the report were taken from different contexts and time periods and did not demonstrate a linear development towards restrictions on immunity.

94. Members disagreed on the extent and the relevance of treaty practice with regard to limitations and exceptions to immunity. Some members asserted that treaty practice did not establish a trend towards restricting the immunity of foreign State officials. In their view, few treaties provided for limitations and exceptions, and any practice in regard to those treaties could not be counted towards the existence of a customary rule. It was pointed out that many treaties, including treaties relating to diplomatic and consular relations, as well as those relating to international crimes, did not provide for limitations or exceptions. Moreover, a number of members noted that treaties providing for individual responsibility in the case of international crimes, even where they denied immunity before international courts, did not affect the immunity of foreign officials before domestic courts.

95. Other members asserted that treaty practice had marked a deliberate move towards limitations and exceptions of immunity of State officials. Some members placed that development within the context of the work of the Commission on individual criminal responsibility, noting that relevant instruments, such as the Principles of International Law Recognized in the Charter of the Nürnberg Tribunal and in the Judgment of the Tribunal, as well as the work on the draft Code of Crimes against the Peace and Security of Mankind and international criminal jurisdiction rejected immunity for international crimes. Such members maintained that the present draft article should follow the example of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, which in article 27 declares the irrelevance of official capacity. Reference was also made to the Protocol on Amendments to the Protocol on the Statute of the African Court of Justice and Human Rights (Malabo Protocol), as adopted by the African Union. Furthermore, some members noted that the proliferation of treaties containing a "prosecute or extradite" provision had a bearing on the scope of immunity of State officials. They suggested that the obligation to prosecute international crimes implied a limitation on the scope of immunity of State officials.

96. With regard to domestic legislation, some members noted that there were few examples of domestic laws recognizing limitations and exceptions to immunity of foreign officials, even in cases of international crimes. A few members noted that domestic legislation implementing the Rome Statute typically only dealt with institutional issues or with questions of extradition, rather than immunity. It was highlighted that the few countries whose legislation had contained broader exception clauses had recently revised their laws on immunity of State officials to restrict the scope of the limitations and exceptions.

97. Other members maintained that domestic laws reflected the trend indicated by the Special Rapporteur. The view was expressed that even if domestic legislation often focused on State immunity, at least it demonstrated a trend towards the restriction of immunity. Some members noted that the domestic implementation of the Rome Statute had a direct effect on the regime of immunity in domestic courts.

98. Several members criticized the small number of domestic cases examined in the fifth report. It was noted that many of the cases had been overturned or did not relate to immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction, but to State immunity or immunity in civil proceedings. Some members asserted that the report should have examined the reasons why immunity had been declined or upheld in particular cases; should have analysed cases in which prosecutors had decided not to prosecute due to the immunity of the official involved; and should have considered cases in which States had unsuccessfully invoked immunity.

99. A number of members maintained that the small sample of domestic cases analysed in the report did not affect its substantive analysis. The Special Rapporteur was encouraged to further consider regional practice, including, for example, case law from Asia and the jurisprudence of the Inter-American Court of Human Rights.

100. Several members stressed that the trend in international jurisprudence ran counter to the conclusions drawn in the fifth report. It was emphasized that international and regional courts had repeatedly upheld immunity, even in cases involving international crimes or violations of peremptory norms of international law (jus cogens). International jurisprudence had underlined that immunity, which was procedural in nature, was not affected by the gravity of an act. A number of members also emphasized the difference between international and domestic courts. They maintained that the lack of immunity before international criminal tribunals did not entail the non-application of immunity in domestic courts. It was pointed out that international tribunals had only recognized the denial of immunity by domestic courts in cases that related to cooperation with such tribunals.

101. Other members asserted that the analysis of international jurisprudence by the Special Rapporteur supported her approach to limitations and exceptions of immunity. Several members noted that many of the international decisions upholding immunity did not relate to individual criminal responsibility, but dealt with immunity in civil proceedings, State immunity, officials enjoying immunity ratione personae, or questions of State responsibility. Some members also pointed out that international courts and tribunals had made the application of immunity conditional on the availability of alternative redress; if no such redress was available, immunity could not be upheld. Reference was made to individual and dissenting opinions that emphasized that the requirements of sovereignty should not override the need for accountability, but that a balance should be struck.

Progressive development of international law and its codification

102. In the view of some members, the report could have indicated more clearly whether it sought to determine the scope of existing international law (lex lata), whether it followed an emerging trend towards desirable norms (lex ferenda) or whether it aimed to set out "new law". It was noted that the Commission's dual mandate of codification and progressive development required it to closely follow established practice or to openly assert the progressive nature of its work, respectively. Several members urged the Commission to focus on existing law, rather than to engage in progressive development. It was noted that the Commission was not drafting a new treaty, the rules of which would ultimately be subject to the approval of States, but that it aimed to produce a set of guidelines on current practice, for use by non-specialists involved in domestic prosecutions.

103. In that regard, a number of members criticized the fifth report for the nature in which it asserted the existence of customary international law with regard to limitations and exception, without establishing a solid foundation for that in practice. In the view of several members, the report did not sufficiently highlight the serious disagreements within the Commission and within the Sixth Committee over the substantive and procedural aspects of that issue. It was suggested that, due to such differences, the Commission ought to proceed cautiously.

104. Other members stated that the Commission's work on the question of limitations and exceptions should reflect both codification and progressive development. It was asserted that the fifth report accurately captured the current state of international law on immunity of foreign officials. Such members noted that the lingering uncertainty over the scope of immunity ought to encourage the Commission to provide guidelines on the issue, irrespective of the views of States. The Commission was urged not to forget its commitment to the progressive development of international law, as it had displayed in various earlier instruments. For some of those members, the possibility of developing draft articles to form the basis of a treaty on the subject could not be discounted at this stage.

105. Some members questioned whether State practice supported an alleged trend towards limitations and exceptions to immunity of State officials as proposed. Those members maintained that no such trend existed or, if a trend could be discerned, that it pointed in the opposite direction. It was recalled that several States had recently restricted the scope of limitations and exceptions to immunity in their domestic legislation, and international and regional courts had typically upheld the immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction in recent cases.

106. Other members asserted that, even if not all aspects of the report found a firm basis in customary international law, a trend towards limitations and exceptions of immunity ratione materiae did exist. A number of members claimed that developments in the field of State immunity, international criminal law and international human rights law supported such a trend. Moreover, it was asserted that courts and tribunals increasingly refused to apply immunity, either because the alleged acts violated peremptory norms of international law (jus cogens) or because they considered that such acts could not be performed in an official capacity. Further, certain States had expressed their support for restricting the scope of immunity of foreign officials. Some members maintained that the Commission ought to bolster such a trend, in order to fight impunity and lift impediments to the prosecution of international crimes.

International law as a system

107. It was emphasized by some members that the draft articles ought to strike a balance between, on the one hand, the sovereign equality of States and the need for stability in international relations and, on the other hand, the interest of the international community as a whole in preventing and punishing the most serious crimes under international law.

108. Other members expressed concern that the limitations and exceptions to immunity proposed by the Special Rapporteur could foster abuse, for example by enabling politically motivated trials of State officials in foreign jurisdictions. This could weaken stability in international relations and run counter to the cause of fighting impunity and promoting human rights. It was emphasized that, as a fundamental principle of international law, the courts of one State should not sit in judgment over the acts of another State.

109. Several members noted that the system of immunity could and should not stand in the way of the protection of the fundamental interests of the international community. It was emphasized that the protection of human rights and the fight against impunity were not peripheral to the sovereignty of States, but had to be reconciled with it. In the view of such members, perpetrators of international crimes ought not to be allowed to hide behind the cloak of sovereignty to shield themselves from prosecution, as their acts caused severe instability in the countries and regions in which they were perpetrated, eventually affecting the international community as a whole. The point was made that the rules on immunity should not be considered in isolation, but in the light of other norms of the international legal system.

110. Some members noted that the question of limitations and exceptions was closely related to that of procedural aspects of immunity, including procedural safeguards and guarantees. Several members expressed regret that the Special Rapporteur had not submitted a sixth report on that issue at the present session. A number of members suggested that the Commission ought to postpone its work on limitations and exceptions until after the Special Rapporteur had expounded her views on procedural aspects in her sixth report, so that the two issues could be considered in conjunction.

111. It was noted that procedural safeguards could help to strike the necessary balance between the respect for the sovereign equality of States and the need to fight impunity. Several members referred to the work of the previous Special Rapporteur on the topic, who had dealt with various procedural issues relating to timing, invocation, burden of proof and the waiver of immunity. With regard to waiver, some members proposed the establishment of a procedure whereby immunity had to be explicitly invoked by the State of the official; or the establishment of a treaty-based duty to "waive or prosecute", according to which States would have to choose whether to waive immunity in a foreign court or to prosecute the case themselves.

112. Emphasizing the procedural nature of immunity, a number of members noted that, when successfully invoked through diplomatic channels or in courts, immunity suspended the jurisdiction of foreign courts, but did not affect the criminal responsibility of the alleged offenders. Given its preliminary nature, courts had to consider the question of immunity before proceeding to the merits. It was stated that, for this reason, the gravity of an alleged act could have no bearing on the application of immunity, or on its sovereign or official nature. Such members maintained that this did not leave an accountability gap, since, for example, a State, by invoking the immunity of its official and recognizing its acts as its own, would trigger its own responsibility and could be sued itself at the national or international level.

113. Other members maintained that, while a discussion of procedural aspects was very important for the topic as a whole, the Commission first had to identify the substantive features of limitations and exceptions to immunity. It was pointed out that procedural aspects were relevant to the draft articles as a whole and could only be considered after all substantive elements had been discussed. Several members wished not to pre-empt the Commission's debate on the topic of the sixth report and urged the Commission not to delay its consideration of the limitations and exceptions to immunity.

114. A number of members asserted that there was a strong link between immunity and impunity for international crimes. It was pointed out that, if no alternative forum or jurisdiction for prosecution of international crimes was available, the procedural barrier of immunity in domestic courts would entail substantive effects. Some members emphasized that substantive justice should not be the victim of procedural justice, particularly in the case of violations of peremptory norms of international law (jus cogens). Such members cautioned that an exclusively procedural approach to immunity would have a negative impact on the development of individual responsibility in international law.

115. It was noted that the International Criminal Court, the most obvious forum for the prosecution of State officials, did not have the capacity or the resources to prosecute all alleged perpetrators of international crimes. As the Court operated on the basis of complementarity, those members maintained that domestic courts should remain the principal forums for combating impunity. It was also noted that the responsibility of a State for an act did not negate the individual responsibility of an official and should not stand in the way of individual prosecutions.

(b) Specific comments on draft article 7

116. Some members questioned why the proposed title of draft article 7 referred to situations "in respect of which immunity does not apply", when the report discussed "limitations and exceptions" to immunity. It was suggested that the uncertainty over the meaning and scope of the phrase "limitations and exceptions" demonstrated that draft article 7 did not reflect settled international law.

117. A number of members considered that the distinction between limitations and exceptions was useful and should be maintained. It helped to distinguish situations in which immunity was not at issue, because the relevant conduct could not be considered as an official act or as performed in official capacity, from cases in which immunity was excluded on the basis of exceptional circumstances.

118. Other members supported the wording proposed by the Special Rapporteur. It was pointed out that the work on the topic so far had proceeded on the assumption that immunity applied and that draft article 7 should thus deal with its "non-application". Some members noted that a distinction might provide theoretical clarity, but that it had no basis in the practice of States.

119. Some members reiterated their general reservations regarding draft article 7, as proposed. It was suggested that one way forward would be to reformulate the draft article on the basis of an obligation to waive or prosecute core international crimes, which would entail a duty of a State either to waive the immunity of its officials before the courts of a foreign State, or to undertake to fulfil its obligation to prosecute its own officials.

120. A number of members questioned whether the list of crimes included in paragraph 1 was exhaustive or merely illustrative. A suggestion was made to include a general reference to the most serious crimes under international law, rather than including a list of crimes. Some members noted that the paragraph should leave open the possibility of the emergence of new crimes to which immunity would not apply. Other members questioned the basis in customary international law for the crimes listed by the Special Rapporteur, as well as the grounds for including some crimes and not others conceivably within the same genre. It was also suggested that the draft article, or the commentaries thereto, should provide appropriate definitions of the crimes listed.

121. With regard to subparagraph (a), several members expressed their support for the inclusion of the core crimes of genocide, crimes against humanity and war crimes. Some members noted that torture and enforced disappearance, both listed by the Special Rapporteur, fell within the scope of crimes against humanity. Suggestions were made to add the crimes of slavery, apartheid, terrorism and crimes against global cultural heritage.

122. Members further debated whether the crime of aggression should be included in the draft article. Those arguing in favour of inclusion pointed to the prominence of the crime of aggression under the Nürnberg Principles and its pending activation in the Rome Statute. It was also noted that the implementing legislation of some States provided for domestic prosecution of the crime. Other members agreed with the Special Rapporteur that the crime of aggression should be excluded, for the reasons outlined in the fifth report. It was maintained that prosecution of State officials for the crime of aggression by other States would affect the sovereign equality of States, an issue that would not arise in the case of prosecution before an international court.

123. Commenting on subparagraph (b), a number of members questioned whether State practice supported the inclusion of corruption as a limitation or exception to immunity. It was also noted that the text proposed by the Special Rapporteur left the definition and scope of corruption rather vague. Some members maintained that corruption could not be performed in an official capacity, as it was always done with an eye to private gain. In that regard, it was noted that immunity for corruption had already been excluded on the basis of draft article 6. It was suggested that the subparagraph could be removed and that a reference to corruption could be included in the commentaries.

124. Other members supported the inclusion of the crime of corruption in the text of the draft article, noting that the international community had to cooperate to prevent and punish the crime. It was pointed out that domestic courts had often rejected claims for immunity in corruption cases, that many States legislated to prevent and punish corruption, and that corruption had been the subject of various international and regional conventions.

125. Some members emphasized that corruption seriously affected the functioning of public institutions and the rule of law and could significantly impact the socioeconomic situation of domestic populations. It was suggested that the draft article should focus on “grand” or large-scale corruption. A suggestion was made that the subparagraph could indicate what should happen to the proceeds of the crime of corruption when officials were prosecuted in foreign jurisdictions. It was pointed out that that was a matter of the political will of the States involved, but that ordinarily the funds would have to be returned to the country from which they had been taken.

126. Some members noted that the territorial tort exception, on which subparagraph (c) was modelled, was well established in civil proceedings but not in the criminal sphere. It was pointed out that the authorities cited by the Special Rapporteur mostly referred to civil cases and that the report insufficiently examined its applicability in criminal law. Several members mentioned that the concept remained controversial in international law and that the report left a number of issues open, for example its application to military activities and other public acts. In that regard, it was suggested that the subparagraph be formulated more narrowly. Several members referred to the definition proposed by the previous Special Rapporteur on the topic. It was also suggested that the scope of the subparagraph be restricted to specific acts contrary to State sovereignty, such as espionage, political assassination and sabotage.

127. Members generally agreed with the substance of paragraph 2, noting that it reflected existing practice. Members recommended that the commentaries should specify that only the troika of Heads of State, Heads of Government and Ministers for Foreign Affairs could enjoy immunity ratione personae. It was emphasized that, in line with international jurisprudence, immunity ratione personae was without prejudice to the criminal responsibility of those enjoying it. A suggestion was made to indicate that immunity ratione personae did not apply before international courts.

128. Some members suggested that paragraph 2 was superfluous and could be deleted. They proposed to specify in paragraph 1 that the limitations and exceptions listed in the draft article only applied to immunity ratione materiae. Other members preferred to retain the paragraph to highlight the difference between immunity ratione personae and immunity ratione materiae. A suggestion was made to align the temporal scope of the application of immunity ratione personae and immunity ratione materiae with draft articles 4 and 6. Moreover, the view was expressed that immunity ratione personae should be restricted, as it could lead to impunity in cases of lifetime rulers.

129. Several members accepted the inclusion of the without-prejudice clause in paragraph 3. It was noted that, contrary to subparagraph (a), the clause should also apply to treaties under which immunity was applicable. With regard to subparagraph (b), some members considered the reference to an "international tribunal" too vague and suggested that the draft article specify whether that referred to international criminal courts and tribunals, or to any international tribunal. The view was expressed that the paragraph remained prejudicial and should be deleted, as it could potentially affect matters subject to ongoing judicial proceedings.

(c) Future work

130. Many members expressed their anticipation of the sixth report, which would deal with procedural aspects of immunity. It was suggested that the Special Rapporteur should discuss the relationship between immunity and statutes of limitation for crimes to which no limitations or exceptions applied. Some members noted that the Commission should revisit some of the texts provisionally adopted, for example the definition of "immunity from jurisdiction", in order to determine whether it included questions of inviolability.

3. Concluding remarks of the Special Rapporteur

131. In her summary of the debate, the Special Rapporteur expressed her satisfaction with the wide-ranging and interesting discussion that the fifth report had evoked. Responding to some of the criticism on the structure and content of the report, the Special Rapporteur emphasized that all sections of the report were equally relevant to its conclusions. She also noted that it was the substance of the arguments advanced that mattered, not whether she had followed the approach of the previous Special Rapporteur.

132. With regard to the analysis of practice in the fifth report, the Special Rapporteur recalled the various views expressed. She emphasized that the jurisprudence of international courts did not unequivocally exclude the application of limitations and exceptions to immunity ratione materiae, as those decisions primarily dealt with State immunity or immunity ratione personae. She also stressed the importance of national jurisprudence, which, although it might have been limited and not sufficiently homogeneous, was at the heart of the project. She thanked members for suggesting the addition of international, regional and domestic case law.

133. The Special Rapporteur stated the report's analysis of domestic legislation helped differentiate immunity of State officials from State immunity; highlighted the relative nature of State immunity; and illustrated the use of the "territorial tort exception". She also noted that domestic legislation implementing the Rome Statute could shine a light on the question of immunity of State officials, particularly when it went beyond the requirements of the Rome Statute. The Special Rapporteur noted that other forms of State practice, such as decisions by prosecutors or diplomatic demarches, were typically not available in the public domain and could thus not be considered as relevant practice.

134. The Special Rapporteur acknowledged the disagreement between members over a possible customary rule or emerging trend towards limitations and exceptions to immunity of State officials. She maintained that the Commission ought to focus on identifying the relevant rules lex lata and lex ferenda relating to immunity. She did not support the view that the Commission was engaged in crafting "new law" on the issue, as suggested by some members. In that regard, the Special Rapporteur noted that the draft articles, similar to other projects of the Commission, contained elements of both codification and progressive development and that they should be assessed in that light.

135. The Special Rapporteur reiterated her position that the distinction between limitations and exceptions, as set out in the report, helped to illuminate the concept of immunity of State officials and its role within the international legal system. In her view, that approach was not incompatible with the pragmatic formulation of draft article 7, which focused on the situation in which immunity "does not apply"; rather, that formulation avoided a number of controversies relating to the distinction between limitations and exceptions and found its basis in practice.

136. The Special Rapporteur agreed with members that a discussion of the procedural aspects of immunity was of vital importance to the project. She noted, however, that procedural issues went beyond questions of limitations and exceptions, affected the draft articles as a whole and should be dealt with after the Commission had considered the issue of limitations and exceptions to immunity. She pointed out that the previous Special Rapporteur had taken a similar approach and reiterated her offer to hold informal consultations on that matter, in preparation of submission of the sixth report.

137. Turning to specific comments on the draft article proposed in the fifth report, the Special Rapporteur noted that many members were in favour of retaining paragraph 1, although various suggestions for revision of its content had been made. With regard to subparagraph (a), the Special Rapporteur expressed her readiness to include the crime of apartheid, but continued to have reservations regarding the inclusion of other transnational crimes, as the latter were treaty based and did not derive from custom. Moreover, the Special Rapporteur maintained her hesitancy regarding the inclusion of the crime of aggression, as it risked increased politicization of the entire project. For a similar reason, she preferred to maintain a list of specific crimes, rather than including an open, general reference to international crimes. Definitions of the specific crimes could be provided in the commentaries, possibly by reference to existing treaties.

138. The Special Rapporteur noted that the inclusion of corruption in subparagraph (b) remained controversial. She acknowledged that the provision should principally apply to matters of "grand corruption", a term that was to be further specified in the commentaries. She emphasized that, since corruption was always committed for private gain, it could not be considered as an act performed in an official capacity, to which immunity ratione materiae would apply. With regard to the "territorial tort exception", as contained in subparagraph (c), the Special Rapporteur maintained that its application was not restricted to the sphere of civil jurisdiction. In its current form, it aimed at addressing major offences, such as sabotage and espionage.

139. The Special Rapporteur also noted the general agreement on paragraph 2, which highlighted that limitations and exceptions did not apply in case of immunity ratione personae, a well-established position in practice and doctrine. In her view, the explicit reference to immunity ratione personae provided a balance between the principle of sovereign equality and the need to fight impunity, which might be undone were the paragraph deleted. She also expressed her preference for retaining the non-prejudice clauses in paragraph 3, which would facilitate the resolution of any normative conflict between the draft articles and existing international instruments, in particular those relating to international criminal courts and tribunals.

Commentary

(1) Draft article 7 lists crimes under international law in respect of which immunity from foreign criminal jurisdiction ratione materiae shall not apply under the present draft articles. The draft article contains two paragraphs, one that lists the crimes (para. 1) and one that identifies the definition of those crimes (para. 2).

(2) As draft article 7 refers solely to immunity from jurisdiction ratione materiae, it is included in Part Three of the draft articles and does not apply in respect of immunity from jurisdiction ratione personae, which is regulated in Part Two of the draft articles.

(3) This does not mean, however, that the State officials listed in draft article 3 (Heads of State, Heads of Government and Ministers for Foreign Affairs) will always be exempt from the application of draft article 7. On the contrary, it should be borne in mind that, as the Commission has indicated, Heads of State, Heads of Government and Ministers for Foreign Affairs "enjoy immunity ratione personae only during their term of office"[759] and the cessation of such immunity "is without prejudice to the application of the rules of international law concerning immunity ratione materiae".[760] In addition, draft article 6, on immunity ratione materiae, provides that "[i]ndividuals who enjoyed immunity ratione personae ..., whose term of office has come to an end, continue to enjoy immunity with respect to acts performed in an official capacity during such term of office".[761] Accordingly, as this residual immunity is immunity ratione materiae, draft article 7 will be applicable to the immunity from jurisdiction enjoyed by a former Head of State, a former Head of Government or a former Minister for Foreign Affairs for acts performed in an official capacity during their term of office. Therefore, such immunity will not apply to these former officials in connection with the crimes under international law listed in paragraph 1 of draft article 7.

(4) Paragraph 1 of draft article 7 lists the crimes which, if committed, would prevent the application of such immunity from criminal jurisdiction to a foreign official, even if those crimes had been committed by the official acting in an official capacity during his or her term of office. Thus, draft article 7 complements the normative elements of immunity from foreign criminal jurisdiction ratione materiae as defined in draft articles 5 and 6.

(5) The Commission, by a recorded vote, decided to include this draft article for the following reasons. First, it considered that there has been a discernible trend towards limiting the applicability of immunity from jurisdiction ratione materiae in respect of certain types of behaviour that constitute crimes under international law. This trend is reflected in judicial decisions taken by national courts which, even though they do not all follow the same line of reasoning, have not recognized immunity from jurisdiction ratione materiae in relation to certain international crimes.[762] In rare cases, this trend has also been reflected in the adoption of national legislation that provides for exceptions to immunity ratione materiae in relation to the commission of international crimes.[763] This trend has also

Director of Public Prosecutions* (Prince Nasser case), High Court of Justice, Queen's Bench Division, Divisional Court, judgment of 7 October 2014 [2014] EWHC 3419 (Admin.) (the significance of this ruling lies in the fact that it was issued as a "consent order", that is to say, based on an agreement reached between the plaintiffs and the Director of Public Prosecutions, in which the latter agrees that the charges of torture against Prince Nasser are not covered by immunity ratione materiae). In a civil proceeding, the Italian Supreme Court has also asserted that State officials who have committed international crimes do not enjoy immunity ratione materiae from criminal jurisdiction (Ferrini v. Federal Republic of Germany, Court of Cassation, judgment of 11 March 2004, ILR, vol. 128, p. 674). In Jones, although the House of Lords recognized immunity from civil jurisdiction, it reiterated that immunity from criminal jurisdiction is not applicable in the case of torture (Jones v. Kingdom of Saudi Arabia, House of Lords, judgment of 14 June 2006 [2006] UKHL 26, [2007] 1 A.C.). Lastly, it should be noted that the Federal High Court of Ethiopia, albeit in the context of a case pursued against an Ethiopian national, affirmed the existence of a rule of international law preventing the application of immunity to a former Head of State accused of international crimes (Special Prosecutor v. Hailemariam, Federal High Court, judgment of 9 October 1995, ILDC 555 (ET 1995)). National courts have in some cases tried officials of another State for international crimes without expressly ruling on immunity. This occurred, for example, in the Barbie case before the French courts: Fédération Nationale des Déportés et Internés Résistants et Patriotes and others v. Barbie, France, Court of Cassation, judgments of 6 October 1983, 26 January 1984 and 20 December 1985, ILR, vol. 78, p. 125; Fédération Nationale des Déportés et Internés Résistants et Patriotes and others v. Barbie, Rhone Court of Assizes, judgment of 4 July 1987, ILR, vol. 78, p. 148; and Court of Cassation, judgment of 3 June 1988, ILR, vol. 100, p. 330. Meanwhile, the National High Court of Spain has tried various foreign officials for international crimes without deeming it necessary to rule on immunity, in the Pinochet, Scilingo, Cavallo, Guatemala, Rwanda and Tibet cases. In the Rwanda case, however, the National High Court ruled against the prosecution of President Kagame on the grounds that he enjoyed immunity. Similarly, in the Tibet case, the National High Court ruled against the prosecution of the then President Hu Jintao; however, following the end of the latter's term as President of China, the Central Court of Investigation No. 2 of the National High Court allowed his prosecution by order of 9 October 2013, claiming that he no longer enjoyed "diplomatic immunity".

[763] In support of this position, attention has been drawn to Organic Act No. 16/2015 of 27 October, on the privileges and immunities of foreign States, the international organizations based in Spain and international conferences and meetings held in Spain, which establishes a separate regime of immunity for Heads of State, Heads of Government and Ministers for Foreign Affairs, according to which, in respect of "acts performed in the exercise of official functions [by the officials in question] during a term in office, genocide, forced disappearance, war crimes and crimes against humanity shall be excluded from immunity" (art. 23, para. 1, in fine). Also of interest is Act No. 24488 of Argentina, on foreign State immunity, article 3 of which was excluded by Decree No. 849/95 promulgating the Act, with the result that the Argentine courts may not decline to hear a claim against a State for violation of international human rights law. Meanwhile, from a far more limited perspective, the United States Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act, as amended by the Torture Victim Protection Act, establishes a "terrorism exception to the jurisdictional immunity of a foreign State" (section 1605A), which makes it possible to exclude the application of immunity for certain types of acts such as torture or extrajudicial executions, provided that they were carried out by officials of a State previously designated by the competent authorities of the United States as a "State sponsor of terrorism". A similar exception is contained in the State Immunity Act of Canada. Lastly, it should be borne in mind that some limitations or exceptions to immunity in relation to international crimes are contained in national legislation concerning such crimes, either in separate laws (see the Belgian Repression of Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Act, as amended in 2003; the 2003 International Crimes Act of the Netherlands; or the Criminal Code of the Republic of the Niger, as amended in 2003) or in legislation implementing the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court. For implementing legislation that establishes a general exception to immunity, see: Burkina Faso, Act No. 50 of 2009 on the determination of competence and procedures for application of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court by the jurisdictions of Burkina Faso, arts. 7 and 15.1 (according to which the Burkina Faso courts may exercise jurisdiction with respect to persons who have committed a crime that falls within the competence of the Court, even in cases where it was committed abroad, provided that the suspect is in their territory. Moreover, official status shall not be grounds for exception or reduction of responsibility); Comoros, Act No. 11-022 of 13 December 2011 concerning the application of the Rome Statute, art. 7.2 ("the immunities or special rules of procedure accompanying the official status of a person by virtue of the law or of international law shall not prevent national courts from exercising their competence with regard to that person in relation to the offences specified in this Act"); Ireland, International Criminal Court Act 2006, art. 61.1 ("In accordance with article 27, any diplomatic immunity or state immunity attaching to a person by reason of a connection with a state party to the Statute is not a bar to proceedings under this Act in relation to the person"); Mauritius, International Criminal Court Act 2001, art. 4; South Africa, Act No. 27 of 18 July 2002 implementing the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, arts. 4 (2) (a) (i) and 4 (3) (c) (stating that South African courts are competent to prosecute crimes of genocide, crimes against humanity and war crimes when the alleged perpetrator is in South Africa and that any official status claimed by the accused is irrelevant). For implementing legislation that establishes procedures for consultation or limitations only in relation to the duty to cooperate with the International Criminal Court, see: Argentina, Act No. 26200 implementing the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, adopted by Act No. 25390 and ratified on 16 January 2001, arts. 40 and 41; Australia, International Criminal Court Act No. 41 of 2002, art. 12.4; Austria, Federal Act No. 135 of 13 August 2002 on cooperation with the International Criminal Court, arts. 9.1 and 9.3; Canada, 1999 Extradition Act, art. 18; France, Code of Criminal Procedure (under Act No. 2002-268 of 26 February 2002), art. 627.8; Germany, Courts Constitution Act, arts. 20.1 and 21; Iceland, 2003 Act on the International Criminal Court, art. 20.1; Ireland, 2006 International Criminal Court Act No. 30, art. 6.1; Kenya, Act No. 16 of 2008 on International Crimes, art. 27; Liechtenstein, Act of 20 October 2004 on cooperation with the International Criminal Court and other international tribunals, art. 10.1 (b) and (c); Malta, Extradition Act, art. 26S.1; Norway, Act No. 65 of 15 June 2001 concerning implementation of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court of 17 July 1998 in Norwegian law, art. 2; New Zealand, International Crimes and International Criminal Court Act 2000, art. 31.1; United Kingdom, International Criminal Court Act 2001, art. 23.1; Samoa, Act No. 26 of 2007 on the International Criminal Court, arts. 32.1 and 41; Switzerland, Act on Cooperation with the International Criminal Court, art. 6; and Uganda, Act No. 18 of 2006 on the International Criminal Court, art. 25.1 (a) and (b). Denmark is a special case: its Act of 16 May 2001 on the International Criminal Court (art. 2) attributes the settlement of questions on immunity to the executive branch without defining a specific system for consultations.

[764] The existence of a trend towards limiting immunity for international crimes was noted by Judges Higgins, Kooijmans and Buergenthal in their joint separate opinion in Arrest Warrant of 11 April 2000 (Democratic Republic of the Congo v. Belgium), Judgment, I.C.J. Reports 2002, p. 3, at p. 88, para. 85. For its part, the European Court of Human Rights, in Jones and Others v. the United Kingdom, expressly recognized that there appeared to be "some emerging support in favour of a special rule or exception in public international law in cases concerning civil claims for torture", and that, "in light of the developments currently underway in this area of public international law, this is a matter which needs to be kept under review by Contracting States" (Jones and Others v. the United Kingdom, Applications Nos. 34356/06 and 40528/06, judgment of 2 June 2014, ECHR 2014, paras. 213 and 215).

(6) Second, the Commission also took into account the fact that the draft articles on immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction are intended to apply within an international legal order whose unity and systemic nature cannot be ignored. Therefore, the Commission should not overlook other existing standards or clash with the legal principles enshrined in such important sectors of contemporary international law as international humanitarian law, international human rights law and international criminal law. In this context, the consideration of crimes to which immunity from foreign criminal jurisdiction does not apply must be careful and balanced, taking into account the need to preserve respect for the principle of the sovereign equality of States, to ensure the implementation of the principles of accountability and individual criminal responsibility and to end impunity for the most serious international crimes, which is one of the primary objectives of the international community. Striking this balance will ensure that immunity fulfils the purpose for which it was established (to protect the sovereign equality and legitimate interests of States) and that it is not turned into a procedural mechanism to block all attempts to establish the criminal responsibility of certain individuals (State officials) arising from the commission of the most serious crimes under international law.

(7) In the light of the above two reasons, the Commission considers that it must pursue its mandate of promoting the progressive development and codification of international law by applying both the deductive method and the inductive method. It is on this premise that the Commission has included in draft article 7 a list of crimes to which immunity ratione materiae shall not apply for the following reasons: (a) they are crimes which in practice tend to be considered as crimes not covered by immunity ratione materiae from foreign criminal jurisdiction; and (b) they are crimes under international law that have been identified as the most serious crimes of concern to the international community, and there are international, treaty-based and customary norms relating to their prohibition, including an obligation to take steps to prevent and punish them.

(8) However, some members disagreed with this analysis. First, they opposed draft article 7, which had been adopted by vote, stating that: (a) the Commission should not portray its work as possibly codifying customary international law when, for reasons indicated in the footnotes below, it is clear that national case law,[765] national statutes,[766] and

[765] Those members noted that only nine cases are cited (see footnote 762 above) that purportedly expressly address the issue of immunity ratione materiae of a State official from foreign criminal jurisdiction under customary international law, and that most of those cases actually provide no support for the proposition that such immunity is to be denied. For example, in the United Kingdom case of Regina v. Bow Street Metropolitan Stipendiary Magistrate, immunity was denied only with respect to acts falling within the scope of a treaty in force that was interpreted as waiving immunity (the Convention against Torture). The German case of In re Hussein did not concern any of the crimes listed in draft article 7, and the judgment did not assert, in relation to the hypothesis that the then President Hussein had ceased to hold office, that immunity ratione materiae from jurisdiction was not or should not be recognized in that instance. The Bouterse case was not upheld by the Netherlands Supreme Court and the reasoning of the lower court on immunity remained an untested obiter dictum. The Belgian decision in Re Sharon and Yaron was controversial and led the Parliament thereafter to alter Belgian law, resulting in the Court of Cassation affirming a lack of jurisdiction over the case. The same law was at issue in Re Pinochet before the Court of First Instance of Brussels. In the case of Lozano v. Italy, the foreign State official was accorded, not denied, immunity ratione materiae. The case Special Prosecutor v. Hailemariam concerned prosecution by Ethiopia of one of its own nationals, not of a foreign State official. Other cases cited concern situations where immunity has not been invoked, or has been waived; they provide no support for the proposition that a State official does not enjoy immunity ratione materiae from foreign criminal jurisdiction under customary international law if such immunity is invoked. Further, those members noted that the relevance for the topic of civil cases in national courts must be carefully considered; to the extent they are relevant, they tend not to support the exceptions asserted in draft article 7. For example, the case Ferrini v. Federal Republic of Germany (see footnote 762 above) was found by the International Court of Justice as to be inconsistent with the obligations of Italy under international law. See Jurisdictional Immunities of the State (Germany v. Italy: Greece intervening), Judgment, I.C.J. Reports 2012, p. 99. In the case of Jones v. Kingdom of Saudi Arabia (see footnote 762 above), the House of Lords recognized the immunity of the State official. By contrast, in addition to those cases indicated above, those members pointed to several cases where immunity ratione materiae has been invoked and treaty law[767] do not support the exceptions asserted in draft article 7; (b) the relevant practice showed no "trend", temporal or otherwise, in favour of exceptions to immunity ratione materiae from foreign criminal jurisdiction; (c) immunity is a procedural matter and, consequently, (i) it is not possible to assume that the existence of criminal responsibility for any crimes under international law committed by a State official automatically precludes immunity from foreign criminal jurisdiction; (ii) immunity does not depend on the gravity of the act in question or on the fact that such act is prohibited by the peremptory norm of international law; (iii) the issue of immunity must be considered at an early stage of the exercise of jurisdiction, before the case is considered on the merits;[768] (d) the lack of immunity before an international criminal court is not relevant to the issue of immunity from the jurisdiction of national courts; and (e) the establishment of a new system of exceptions to immunity, if not agreed upon by treaty, will likely harm inter-State relations and risks undermining the international community's objective of ending impunity for the most serious international crimes. Furthermore, these members took the view that the Commission, by proposing draft article 7, was conducting a "normative policy" exercise that bore no relation to either the codification or the progressive development of international law. For those members, draft article 7 is a proposal for "new law" that cannot be considered as either lex lata or desirable progressive development of international law. Second, those members of the Commission also stressed the difference between procedural immunity from foreign jurisdiction, on the one hand, and substantive criminal responsibility, on the other, and maintained that the recognition of exceptions to immunity was neither required nor necessarily appropriate for achieving the required balance. Rather, in the view of those members, impunity can be avoided in situations where a State official accepted by national courts in criminal proceedings. See, for example, Senegal, Prosecutor v. Hissène Habré, Court of Appeal of Dakar, judgment of 4 July 2000, and Court of Cassation, judgment of 20 March 2001; ILR vol. 125, pp. 571-577 (immunity accorded to former head of State); Germany, Jiang Zemin, decision of the Federal Prosecutor General of 24 June 2005, 3 ARP 654/03-2 (same).

766 These members noted that very few national laws addressed the issue of immunity ratione materiae of a State official from foreign criminal jurisdiction under customary international law. As acknowledged in the Special Rapporteur's fifth report on immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction (A/CN.4/701), para. 42: "Immunity of the State or of its officials from jurisdiction is not explicitly regulated in most States. On the contrary, the response to immunity has been left to the courts". Of the few national laws that purportedly address such immunity (Burkina Faso, Comoros, Ireland, Mauritius Niger, Spain, South Africa), none support draft article 7 as it is written. For example, the Spanish Organic Act No. 16/2015 of 27 October, art. 23, para. 1, only addresses the immunity ratione materiae of former Heads of State, Heads of Government and Ministers for Foreign Affairs. Statutes such as the Repression of Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Act, as amended in 2003, of Belgium or the 2003 International Crimes Act of the Netherlands, only provide that immunity shall be denied as recognized under international law, without any further specification. Further, those members observed that national laws implementing an obligation to surrender a State official to the International Criminal Court, arising under the Rome Statute or a decision by the Security Council, are not relevant to the issue of immunity of a State official under customary international law from foreign criminal jurisdiction. Also irrelevant are national laws focused on the immunity of States, such as Act No. 24488 of Argentina, the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act of the United States, and the State Immunity Act of Canada (further, it was noted that the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act was not amended by the Torture Victim Protection Act, which has nothing to do with terrorism).

767 These members noted that none of the global treaties addressing specific types of crimes (e.g., genocide, war crimes, apartheid, torture, enforced disappearance) contain any provision precluding immunity ratione materiae of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction, nor do any of the global treaties addressing specific types of State officials (e.g., diplomats, consular officials, officials on special mission).

768 See, for example, Jurisdictional Immunities of the State (Germany v. Italy: Greece intervening) (see footnote 765 above), p. 137, para. 84 ("customary international law does not treat a State's entitlement to immunity as dependent upon the gravity of the act of which it is accused or the peremptory nature of the rule which it is alleged to have violated"); Arrest Warrant of 1 April 2000 (Democratic Republic of the Congo v. Belgium), Judgment, I.C.J. Reports 2002, p. 25, para. 60 ("Immunity from criminal jurisdiction and individual criminal responsibility are quite separate concepts. While jurisdictional immunity is procedural in nature, criminal responsibility is a question of substantive law").

is prosecuted in his or her own State; is prosecuted in an international court; or is prosecuted in a foreign court after waiver of the immunity. Asserting exceptions to immunity that States have not accepted by treaty or through their widespread practice risks creating severe tensions, if not outright conflict, among States whenever one State exercises criminal jurisdiction over the officials of another based solely on an allegation that a heinous crime has been committed.

(9) It should be borne in mind that these members also expressed the view that no decision can be taken on the issue of limitations and exceptions to immunity until the Commission has taken a position on the issue of procedural safeguards. This opinion was not, however, accepted by the majority of Commission members, who, while recognizing the importance of clearly defining procedural safeguards to prevent abuse in the exercise of foreign criminal jurisdiction over State officials, took the view that the issue of the crimes to which immunity from jurisdiction ratione materiae does not apply can be dealt with separately at the present stage of the Commission's work. Nevertheless, in order to reflect the great importance attached by the Commission to procedural issues in the context of the present topic, it was agreed that the current text of the draft articles should include the following footnote: "At its seventieth session, the Commission will consider the procedural provisions and safeguards applicable to the present draft articles." The footnote marker was inserted after the headings of Part Two (Immunity ratione personae) and Part Three (Immunity ratione materiae) of the draft articles, since procedural provisions and safeguards may refer to both categories of immunity, and should also be considered in relation to the draft articles as a whole.

(10) Paragraph 1 (a)-(f) of draft article 7 lists the crimes under international law which, if allegedly committed, would prevent the application of immunity from criminal jurisdiction to a foreign official, even if the official committed those crimes while acting in an official capacity during his or her term of office. The crimes are as follows: the crime of genocide, crimes against humanity, war crimes, the crime of apartheid, torture and enforced disappearance.

(11) The chapeau of the draft article uses the phrase "shall not apply" in order to reflect the fact that in both practice and doctrine two different interpretations have been followed with regard to whether or not such crimes are to be considered "acts performed in an official capacity". One view is that the commission of such crimes can never be considered a function of the State and they therefore cannot be regarded as "acts performed in an official capacity". The contrary view holds that crimes under international law either require the presence of a State element (torture, enforced disappearance) or else must have been committed with the backing, express or implied, of the State machinery, so that there is a connection with the State, and such crimes can therefore be considered in certain cases as "acts performed in an official capacity".[769] Although the Commission did not find it necessary to come down in favour of one or the other of these interpretations, it noted that some national courts have not applied immunity ratione materiae in the exercise of their criminal jurisdiction in respect of these crimes under international law, either because they do not regard them as an act performed in an official capacity or a characteristic function of the State,[770] or because they take the view that, although crimes under international law may constitute such an act or function, such crimes (by virtue of their gravity or because they

[770] See, for example, the following cases: Re Pinochet, Belgium, Court of First Instance of Brussels, judgment of 6 November 1998 (see footnote 762 above), p. 349; In re Hussein, Germany, Higher Regional Court of Cologne, judgment of 16 May 2000 (see footnote 762 above), para. 11 (makes this assertion in relation to the hypothesis that the then President Hussein had ceased to hold office). A similar argument has also been used in some cases when the question of immunity has been raised before the civil courts. See, for example, Prefecture of Voiotia v. Federal Republic of Germany, Court of First Instance of Livadeia (Greece), judgment of 30 October 1997.

(12) Therefore, bearing in mind that, in practice, the same crime under international law has sometimes been interpreted as a limitation (absence of immunity) or as an exception (exclusion of existing immunity), the Commission considered it preferable to address the topic in terms of the effects resulting from each of these approaches, namely, the non-applicability to such crimes of immunity ratione materiae from foreign criminal jurisdiction that otherwise might be enjoyed by a State official. The Commission opted for this formulation for reasons of clarity and certainty, in order to provide a list of crimes which, even if committed by a State official, would preclude the possibility of immunity from foreign criminal jurisdiction.

(13) To that end, the Commission used the phrase "immunity ... shall not apply", following, mutatis mutandis, the technique once used by the Commission in relation to jurisdictional immunity of the State, when it used the phrase "proceedings in which State immunity cannot be invoked" in a similar context.[772] However, in draft article 7, the Commission decided not to use the phrase "cannot be invoked" in order to avoid the procedural component of that phrase, preferring instead to use the neutral phrase "shall not apply".

(14) The expression "from the exercise of foreign criminal jurisdiction" is included in the chapeau for consistency with the formulation used in draft articles 3 and 5, as provisionally adopted by the Commission.

(15) The expression "crimes under international law" refers to conduct that is criminal under international law whether or not such conduct has been criminalized under national law. The crimes listed in draft article 7 are the crimes of greatest concern to the international community as a whole; there is a broad international consensus on their definition as well as on the existence of an obligation to prevent and punish them. These crimes have been addressed in international treaties and are also prohibited by customary international law.

(16) The expression "crimes under international law" was used previously by the Commission in the Principles of International Law recognized in the Charter of the Nürnberg Tribunal and in the Judgment of the Tribunal[773] and in the 1954 draft Code of [771] As happened, for example, in the case of Eichmann, Israel, Supreme Court, judgment of 29 May 1962, ILR, vol. 36, pp. 309-310. In the Ferrini case, the Italian courts based their ruling on both the gravity of the crimes committed and the fact that the conduct in question was contrary to jus cogens norms (Ferrini v. Federal Republic of Germany, Court of Cassation, judgment of 11 March 2004 (see footnote 762 above), p. 674). In the Lozano case, the Italian Court of Cassation based its denial of immunity on the violation of fundamental rights, which have the status of jus cogens norms and must therefore take precedence over the rules governing immunity (Lozano v. Italy, Italy, Court of Cassation, judgment of 24 July 2008 (see footnote 762 above), para. 6). In A. v. Office of the Public Prosecutor of the Confederation, the Federal Criminal Court of Switzerland based its decision on the existence of a customary prohibition of international crimes that the Swiss legislature considers to be jus cogens; it also pointed out the contradiction between prohibiting such conduct and continuing to recognize immunity ratione materiae that would prevent the launch of an investigation (A. v. Office of the Public Prosecutor of the Confederation, Switzerland, Federal Criminal Court, judgment of 25 July 2012 (see footnote 762 above)).

[772] Draft articles on jurisdictional immunities of States and their property, adopted by the Commission at its forty-third session, Yearbook of the International Law Commission, 1991, p. 33. The Commission used the phrase cited above as the title of part III of those draft articles and reiterated a variant (the "State cannot invoke") in articles 10 to 17 in the same part. For an explanation of the reasons that led the Commission to use this phrase, see, in particular, paragraph (1) of the general commentary to part III (p. 33) and paragraphs (1) to (5) of the commentary to article 10 (pp. 33-34). The United Nations Convention on Jurisdictional Immunities of States and Their Property, done at New York on 2 December 2004 (General Assembly resolution 59/38, annex), likewise uses the phrase "Proceedings in which State immunity cannot be invoked" in the title of part III and the variant "the State cannot invoke" in articles 10 to 17.

[773] See principle I of the Principles of International Law recognized in the Charter of the Nürnberg Tribunal and in the Judgment of the Tribunal: "Any person who commits an act which constitutes a Offences against the Peace and Security of Mankind.[774] In this context, the Commission took the view that the use of the expression "crimes under international law" means that "international law provides the basis for the criminal characterization" of such crimes and that "the prohibition of such types of behaviour and their punishability are a direct consequence of international law".[775] What follows from this is "the autonomy of international law in the criminal characterization" of such crimes[776] and the fact that "the characterization, or the absence of characterization, of a particular type of behaviour as criminal under national law has no effect on the characterization of that type of behaviour as criminal under international law".[777] Accordingly, the use of the expression "crimes under international law" directly links the list of crimes contained in paragraph 1 of draft article 7 to international law and ensures that the definition of such crimes is understood in accordance with international standards, and any definition established under domestic law to identify cases in which immunity does not apply is irrelevant.

(17) The category of crimes under international law includes (a) the crime of genocide, (b) crimes against humanity and (c) war crimes. The Commission included these crimes among the crimes in respect of which immunity does not apply for two basic reasons. First, these are crimes about which the international community has expressed particular concern, resulting in the adoption of treaties that are at the heart of international criminal law, international human rights law and international humanitarian law, and the international courts have emphasized not only the gravity of these crimes, but also the fact that their prohibition is customary in nature and that committing them may constitute a violation of peremptory norms of general international law (jus cogens). Second, these crimes arise, directly or indirectly, in the judicial practice of States in relation to cases in which the issue of immunity ratione materiae has been raised. Lastly, it should be noted that these three crimes are included in article 5 of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, where they are described as "the most serious crimes of concern to the international community as a whole".[778] Some members noted, however, that the inclusion of those crimes in draft article 7 found little if any support in practice, in national and international jurisprudence or in national legislation.

(18) The Commission decided not to include the crime of aggression at this time, even though it too is included in article 5 of the Rome Statute and is characterized as a crime under the amendments adopted at the Review Conference of the Rome Statute held in Kampala in 2010.[779] The Commission took this decision in view of the nature of the crime of aggression, which would require national courts to determine the existence of a prior act of aggression by the foreign State, as well as the special political dimension of this type of [774] See article 1 of the draft Code of Offences against the Peace and Security of Mankind adopted in 1954: "Offences against the peace and security of mankind, as defined in this Code, are crimes under international law, for which the responsible individuals shall be punished" (Yearbook ... 1954, vol. II, document A/2693, p. 150). For its part, article 1, paragraph 2, of the draft Code of Crimes against the Peace and Security of Mankind adopted by the Commission in 1996 states that: "Crimes against the peace and security of mankind are crimes under international law and punishable as such, whether or not they are punishable under national law" (Yearbook ... 1996, vol. II (Part Two), p. 17).

crime,[780] given that it constitutes a "crime of leaders"; and also in view of the fact that the Assembly of States Parties to the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court has not taken a decision to activate the Court's jurisdiction over this crime. However, some members stated that the crime of aggression should have been included in paragraph 1 of draft article 7, as it is the most serious of the crimes under international law, it was previously included by the Commission itself in the 1996 draft Code of Crimes against the Peace and Security of Mankind[781] and it is one of the crimes covered by the Rome Statute. Furthermore, a substantial number of States have included the crime of aggression within their national criminal law.[782] Accordingly, they expressed their opposition to the majority decision of the Commission and reserved their position on the matter.

(19) On the other hand, the Commission considered it necessary to include in paragraph 1 of draft article 7 the crimes of (d) apartheid, (e) torture and (f) enforced disappearance as separate categories of crimes under international law in respect of which immunity does not apply. Although these crimes are included in article 7 of the Rome Statute under the category of crimes against humanity,[783] the Commission took into account the following elements to consider them as separate crimes. First, the crimes of apartheid, torture and enforced disappearance have been the subject of international treaties that establish a special legal regime for each crime for the purposes of prevention, suppression and

[780] In this regard, it should be borne in mind that in the commentaries to the 1996 draft Code of Crimes against the Peace and Security of Mankind, the Commission stated the following: "The aggression attributed to a State is a sine qua non for the responsibility of an individual for his participation in the crime of aggression. An individual cannot incur responsibility for this crime in the absence of aggression committed by a State. Thus, a court cannot determine the question of individual criminal responsibility for this crime without considering as a preliminary matter the question of aggression by a State. The determination by a national court of one State of the question of whether another State had committed aggression would be contrary to the fundamental principle of international law par in parem imperium non habet. Moreover, the exercise of jurisdiction by the national court of a State which entails consideration of the commission of aggression by another State would have serious implications for international relations and international peace and security." punishment,[784] which imposes specific obligations on States to take certain measures in their domestic legislation, including the obligation to define such crimes in their national criminal legislation and to take the necessary measures to ensure that their courts are competent to try such crimes.[785] It should be added that the treaties in question establish systems of international cooperation and judicial assistance between States.[786] Second, the Commission also noted that the crimes of apartheid, torture and enforced disappearance are subject under the Rome Statute to a specific threshold that is defined as the commission of such crimes "as part of a widespread or systematic attack directed against any civilian population, with knowledge of the attack",[787] which, however, does not exist in the instruments specifically related to these crimes. Third, the Commission observed that the conventions against torture and enforced disappearance expressly establish that such acts can only be committed by State officials or at their instigation or with their support or acquiescence.[788] In addition, the Commission took into account the fact that, in many cases, when national courts have dealt with these crimes in relation to immunity, they have done so by treating them as separate crimes. The treatment of torture is a good example of this.[789] Some members noted, however, that the inclusion of those crimes in draft article 7 found little if any support in practice, in national and international jurisprudence or in national legislation.

(20) While some members of the Commission suggested that the list should include other crimes such as slavery, terrorism, human trafficking, child prostitution and child pornography, and piracy, which are also the subject of international treaties that establish special legal regimes for each crime for the purposes of prevention, suppression and punishment, the Commission decided not to include them. In doing so, it took into account the fact that these crimes either are already covered by the category of crimes against humanity or do not fully correspond to the definition of crimes under international law stricto sensu, being more correctly described in most cases as transnational crimes. In addition, such crimes are usually committed by non-State actors and are not reflected in national judicial practice relating to immunity from jurisdiction. In any event, the non-inclusion of other international crimes in draft article 7 should not be taken to mean that the Commission underestimates the seriousness of such crimes.

(21) Lastly, it should be noted that the Commission did not include in draft article 7, paragraph 1, the crimes of corruption or crimes affected by the so-called "territorial tort [789] As in the case, for example, of the United Kingdom, where cases relating to immunity from jurisdiction ratione materiae which raised the question of the non-applicability of such immunity to acts of torture have been based on the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment. exception" proposed by the Special Rapporteur.[790] This does not mean, however, that the Commission considers that immunity from foreign criminal jurisdiction ratione materiae should apply to these two categories of crimes.

(22) With regard to corruption (understood as "grand corruption"), several members of the Commission pointed out that crimes of corruption are especially serious as they directly affect the interests and stability of the State, the well-being of its population and even its international relations. Consequently, those members were in favour of including an exception to immunity ratione materiae. However, other members of the Commission argued that, while the seriousness of the crime of corruption cannot be called into question, its inclusion in draft article 7 posed a problem, related essentially to the general nature of the term "corruption" and the wide range of acts that can be included in this category, as well as the fact that, in their view, treaty practice and case law do not provide sufficient grounds for including such crimes among the limitations and exceptions to immunity. Other members questioned whether corruption met the test of gravity of the other crimes listed in draft article 7. Lastly, several members of the Commission pointed out that corruption cannot under any circumstances be regarded as an act performed in an official capacity and therefore need not be included among the crimes for which immunity does not apply.

(23) Especially in view of that last argument, the Commission decided not to include crimes of corruption in draft article 7, on the grounds that they do not constitute "acts performed in an official capacity", but are acts carried out by a State official solely for his or her own benefit.[791] Although some members of the Commission pointed out that the involvement of State officials in such acts cannot be ignored, because it is precisely their official status that facilitates and makes possible the crime of corruption, some members of the Commission took the view that the fact that the crime is committed by an official does not change the nature of the act, which remains an act performed for the official's own benefit even if the official uses State facilities that might give the act a semblance of official status. Accordingly, since the normative element contained in draft article 6, paragraph 1, does not apply to the crime of corruption, several members of the Commission took the view that immunity from jurisdiction ratione materiae does not exist in relation to the crime of corruption and therefore the latter does not need to be included in the list of crimes for which immunity does not apply.[792]

(24) The Commission also considered the case of other crimes committed by a foreign official in the territory of the forum State without that State's consent to both the official's presence in its territory and the activity carried out by the official that gave rise to the commission of the crime (territorial exception). This scenario differs in many respects from the crimes under international law included in paragraph 1 of draft article 7 or the crime of corruption. Although the view was expressed that immunity could exist in these circumstances and the exception should not be included in draft article 7 because there was insufficient practice to justify doing so, the Commission decided not to include it in the draft article for other reasons. The Commission considers that certain crimes,[793] such as murder, espionage, sabotage or kidnapping, committed in the territory of a State in the aforementioned circumstances are subject to the principle of territorial sovereignty and do not give rise to immunity from jurisdiction ratione materiae, and therefore there is no need to include them in the list of crimes for which this type of immunity does not apply. This is without prejudice to the immunity from criminal jurisdiction enjoyed under special rules of international law, as set forth in draft article 1, paragraph 2.

Paragraph 2 and annex

(25) Paragraph 2 of draft article 7 establishes a link between paragraph 1 of the article and the annex to the draft articles, entitled "List of treaties referred to in draft article 7, paragraph 2". While the concept of "crimes under international law" and the concepts of "crime of genocide", "crimes against humanity", "war crimes", "crime of apartheid", "torture" and "enforced disappearance" belong to well established categories in contemporary international law, the Commission is mindful that the fact that draft article 7 refers to "crimes" means that the principle of legal certainty characteristic of criminal law must be preserved and tools must be provided to avoid subjectivity in identifying what is meant by each of the aforementioned crimes.

(26) However, the Commission did not consider it necessary to define the crime of genocide, crimes against humanity, war crimes, the crime of apartheid, torture and enforced disappearance, as this is not part of its mandate within the framework of the present draft articles. On the contrary, the Commission found it preferable to simply identify the treaty instruments that define the aforementioned categories, for inclusion in a list that will enable legal practitioners to act with greater certainty in applying draft article 7. The outcome of this exercise is the list contained in the annex to the draft articles.

(27) As indicated in paragraph 2 of draft article 7, the linkage of each crime with the treaties listed in the annex is only for the purposes of draft article 7 on the immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction, in order to identify the definitions of the crimes listed in paragraph 1 of the article without assuming or requiring that States must be parties to those instruments.

(28) On the other hand, it should be borne in mind that the listing of certain treaties has no effect on the customary nature of these crimes, as recognized under international law, or on the specific obligations that may arise from those treaties for States parties. Similarly, the inclusion of only some of the treaties that define the crimes in question has no effect on other treaties that define or regulate the same crimes, whose definitions and legal regimes remain intact for States parties in their application of those treaties. In conclusion, the reference to a specific treaty for the definition of each of the crimes listed in paragraph 1 of draft article 7 is included for reasons of convenience and appropriateness and solely for the purposes of draft article 7 and in no way affects the other rules of customary or treaty-based international law that refer to such crimes and that contain legal regimes of general scope for each of them.

(29) The choice of treaties whose articles are included in the annex to provide a definition of the various crimes under international law was based on three fundamental criteria: (a) the desire to avoid possible confusion when several treaties use different language to define the same crime; (b) the selection of treaties that are universal in scope; and (c) the selection of treaties providing the most up-to-date definitions available.

(30) Genocide was defined for the first time in the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide[794] and its definition has remained constant in contemporary international criminal law, notably in the statute of the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia (art. 4),[795] the statute of the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (art. 2)[796] and, in particular, the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, article 6 of which reproduces the definition contained in the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide. For its part, the Commission defined genocide in article 17 of the 1996 draft Code of Crimes against the Peace and Security of Mankind.[797] For the purposes of the present draft articles, the Commission has included in the annex both the Rome Statute (art. 6) and the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide (art. II), given that the wording used in the two instruments is practically identical and has the same meaning.

(31) With regard to crimes against humanity, it should be recalled that some international treaties have identified certain behaviours as "crimes against humanity"[798] and that international courts have ruled on the customary nature of this category of crimes. The statute of the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia (art. 5) and the statute of the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (art. 3) have also defined this crime. The Commission itself defined this category of crimes in the 1996 draft Code of Crimes against the Peace and Security of Mankind (art. 18).[799] However, the Rome Statute was the first instrument to define this category of crimes separately and comprehensively. For this reason, the Commission considered that article 7 of the Rome Statute should be taken as the definition of crimes against humanity for the purposes of the present draft article. This is consistent with the decision taken earlier by the Commission on the draft articles on crimes against humanity, draft article 3 of which reproduces the definition of this category of crimes contained in article 7 of the Rome Statute.[800]

(32) The concept of war crimes has a long tradition that was originally associated with treaties on international humanitarian law. The Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949 for the protection of war victims and the Protocol Additional to the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949, and relating to the Protection of Victims of International Armed Conflicts (Additional Protocol I), define that category of crimes as "grave breaches".[801] War crimes were defined in the statute of the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia (arts. 2 and 3) and the statute of the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (art. 4), as well as by the Commission itself in the 1996 draft Code of Crimes against the Peace and Security of Mankind (art. 20).[802] The latest definition of war crimes is contained in article 8, paragraph 2, of the Rome Statute, which draws on previous experience and refers comprehensively to war crimes committed in both international and internal armed conflicts, as well as to crimes recognized on the basis of treaties and customary law. For the purposes of the present draft article, the Commission decided to retain the definition contained in article 8, paragraph 2, of the Rome Statute, as the most up-to-date version of the definition of this category of crimes. This does not imply, however, that the importance of the Geneva Conventions of 1949 and the Additional Protocol thereto in relation to the definition of war crimes should be overlooked.

(33) The crime of apartheid was defined for the first time in the International Convention on the Suppression and Punishment of the Crime of Apartheid of 30 November 1973, which, although it describes apartheid as a crime against humanity and a crime under international law (art. I), contains a detailed and separate definition of the crime of apartheid (art. II). For this reason, the Commission decided to retain the definition in the 1973 Convention for the purposes of the present draft article.

(34) Torture is defined as a violation of human rights in all the relevant international instruments. Its characterization as prohibited conduct liable to criminal prosecution is found for the first time in the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment of 10 December 1984, which defines it as a separate crime in article 1, paragraph 1. This definition includes, moreover, the significant requirement that an act cannot be characterized as torture unless it is carried out by or at the instigation of or with the consent of public officials, which places this crime squarely within the scope of the present draft articles. A similar definition is contained in the Inter-American Convention to Prevent and Punish Torture (arts. 2 and 3).[803] The Commission considers that, for the purposes of the present draft article, torture is to be understood in accordance with the definition in the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment.

(35) The enforced disappearance of persons was defined for the first time in the Inter-American Convention on Forced Disappearance of Persons, of 9 June 1994 (art. II).[804] The International Convention for the Protection of All Persons from Enforced Disappearance, of 20 December 2006, also defines this crime (art. 2). As in the case of torture, this definition requires that the act be carried out by or at the instigation of or with the consent of public officials, which places this crime squarely within the scope of the present draft articles. The Commission therefore considers that, for the purposes of the present draft article, the definition of enforced disappearance should be understood in accordance with article 2 of the 2006 Convention.

Editor's Summary

President Al Bashir of Sudan attended the African Union ("AU") Summit hosted by the RSA Government in June 2015. At the time there were warrants for his arrest issued by the International Criminal Court ("the ICC") in respect of war crimes, crimes against humanity, and genocide. The Statute of the International Criminal Court was adopted in Rome on 17 July 1998. The RSA is a State Party to the Rome Statute. As a State Party, the RSA was obliged to bring about the domestication of the provisions of the statute into RSA law. It did so by enacting the Implementation of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court Act 27 of 2002 ("the Implementation Act"). This obliges the government to co-operate with the ICC to effect the arrest of persons suspected of war crimes, genocide and crimes against humanity. The ICC had requested State Parties to the Statute including South Africa to arrest Bashir in the event that he entered their jurisdictions.

When Bashir was in the RSA on 14 and 15 June 2015 the Government failed to arrest him. The Southern Africa Litigation Centre, a human rights organisation, brought an urgent application aimed at requiring the RSA Government to arrest Bashir and surrender him to the ICC. The Government opposed the application, contending that Bashir, as a foreign head of state attending the AU summit, was immune from arrest. The Government relied on a hosting agreement that it had concluded with the AU which provided that the RSA would grant members and staff of the AU Commission, delegates, and representatives of intergovernmental organisations attending the meeting certain privileges and immunities. The Government also relied on the AU Convention which conferred immunity from arrest or detention on representatives of member states. This purported recognition of immunity was formalised by the adoption of a Cabinet minute and the publication of a Government Notice issued under section 5(3) of the Diplomatic Immunities and Privileges Act 37 of 2001. The Notice stated the terms of the hosting agreement.

On 14 June 2015 when the urgent application first came before the High Court an interim order was made prohibiting Bashir from leaving the RSA and ordering the Government to enforce that prohibition. The matter was postponed until the next day to give the Government an opportunity to file answering affidavits. However, Bashir left the RSA at about 11:30am on 15 June 2015 from Waterkloof Air Base while the matter was still being argued. At the commencement of the hearing, Counsel for the Government, upon being asked by the Court, gave an assurance that Bashir was still in the country. The Court made an order at about 1pm declaring that the conduct of the Respondents to the extent that they had failed to take steps to arrest and detain Bashir was inconsistent with the Constitution, and an order requiring Respondents forthwith to take all reasonable steps to prepare to arrest Bashir and detain him, pending a formal request from the International Criminal Court for his surrender. After this order was made Counsel for the Government informed the Court that Bashir had left the RSA earlier that day.

The High Court refused the Government leave to appeal against its order, considering that Bashir's departure had rendered the litigation moot. On petition to the Supreme Court of Appeal, the application for leave to appeal was set down for argument in terms of section 17(2)(d) of the Superior Courts Act 10 of 2013.

In the Supreme Court of Appeal the Government abandoned its earlier argument that the hosting agreement provided for certain immunities and privileges which prevented the Government from arresting Bashir "during the duration of the Summit and an additional two days after the conclusion of the Summit". Instead, the Government pointed to section 4(1)(a) of the Diplomatic Immunities and Privileges Act 37 of 2001 ("the DIPA") which provides that "a head of state is immune from the criminal and civil jurisdiction of the Courts of the Republic, and enjoys such privileges as heads of state enjoy in accordance with the rules of customary international law". The Government contended that the general immunity that a head of state enjoys under customary international law and section 4(1) of the DIPA qualified the obligation of the RSA, that would otherwise exist as a State party to the Rome Statute, to arrest and surrender a head of state for whom the ICC had issued an arrest warrant in respect of the commission of international crimes.

A question therefore arose of the relationship between the Implementation Act and the head of state immunity conferred by customary international law and the DIPA.

A further issue was whether there was now an international crimes exception to the principle of head of state immunity, enabling a State or national court to disregard such immunity when called upon by the ICC to assist in implementing an arrest warrant. It was accepted that once a head of state had been brought before the ICC no plea of head of state immunity could be invoked. However, this did not necessarily mean that a State was entitled to ignore head of state immunity when requested to co-operate with the ICC to bring such a person before it. A question of an international crimes exception to head of state immunity arose in this context. In the absence of a binding treaty or other international instrument creating such an exception guidance had to be sought in the decisions of international courts. After a survey and consideration of such decisions, the majority found that it was unable to hold that at this stage of the development of customary international law there was an international crimes exception to the immunity and inviolability that heads of state enjoyed when visiting foreign countries and before foreign national courts.

The Court then turned to the question of whether the enactment of the Implementation Act altered the position.

Whether the Implementation Act had the effect of removing the immunity that Bashir would otherwise enjoy was a matter of the proper construction of the Implementation Act. The principles to be followed in that regard were settled, and were in the present case strongly influenced by the fact that the Implementation Act was a statute that incorporated an international agreement into South African law. The Court was required by section 233 of the Constitution to construe it in a manner consistent with international law. An interpretation of the Implementation Act that resulted in the RSA not complying with its obligations under the Rome Statute was to be avoided if possible. Furthermore, section 39(2) of the Constitution obliged the Court to interpret the Implementation Act in a way that promoted the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights. There were a number of provisions of the Bill of Rights that informed its spirit, purport and objects in this context.

Section 4(2) of the Implementation Act provides that "[d]espite any other law to the contrary, including customary and conventional international law, the fact that a person is or was a head of State or government . . . is neither a defence to a crime nor a ground for any possible reduction of sentence once a person has been convicted of a crime". This was relevant to the interpretational exercise. It was an indication that the RSA did not support immunities when people were charged with international crimes. Recognition of head of state immunity alongside the provisions of section 4(2) to preclude someone from being brought to trial in South Africa would create an anomaly. Under the Criminal Procedure Act an accused was brought to court either by arrest or indictment. Either procedure would compel the accused to submit to the criminal jurisdiction of a South African Court, which was inconsistent with immunity. Under section 4(3)(c) a South African Court had jurisdiction to try someone for an international crime if they were present in the territory of the RSA. In such a trial it would be no answer for the accused to raise immunity. But on the argument for the Government this would not matter because it would be impossible for the accused to be brought before the Court in terms of the Criminal Procedure Act. A construction of section 4(2) that would exclude claims of immunity if a person were being tried before a South African Court, but would not exclude immunity in seeking to bring that person to trial before that Court would be a serious anomaly.

The Court was driven to conclude that when the RSA decided to implement its obligations under the Rome Statute by passing the Implementation Act it did so on the basis that all forms of immunity, including head of state immunity, would not constitute a bar to the prosecution of international crimes in the RSA or to the RSA co-operating with the ICC by way of the arrest and surrender of persons charged with such crimes before the ICC, where an arrest warrant had been issued and a request for co-operation made.

The Court accepted that the relief granted by the High Court (having to deal with the matter as an urgent application) was not as well-formulated as more mature consideration would have permitted. An appropriate order to have made would have read: "The conduct of the Respondents in failing to take steps to arrest and detain, for surrender to the International Criminal Court, the President of Sudan, Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir, after his arrival in South Africa on 13 June 2015 to attend the 25th Assembly of the African Union, was inconsistent with South Africa's obligations in terms of the Rome Statute and section 10 of the Implementation of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court Act 27 of 2002, and unlawful."

Ponnan JA (with Lewis JA concurring) produced a separate judgment concurring in this order.

Several entities had applied for admission as amici curiae. All but one of such applications were dismissed. The majority judgment dealt at some length with the process to be followed by a party desirous of admission as an amicus curiae, the requirements to be admitted as such, and the rights that such admission conferred. In particular, admission as an amicus does not automatically entitle the amicus to make oral submissions. Whether an amicus will be entitled to make oral submissions will be determined by the Court hearing the appeal. Only those parties which show that they have new contentions to advance will be considered for admission as amici. An amicus will not be permitted to traverse ground already covered by other parties, but will be confined to making submissions on the new contentions that it wishes to place before the Court. New contentions are those that may materially affect the outcome of the case. Prospective amici and their advisers must consider the nature and scope of the dispute between the parties and, on that basis, determine whether they have distinct submissions to make that may alter the outcome or persuade the Court to adopt a different line of reasoning in determining the outcome of the appeal.

Wallis JA:

Introduction

[1] The International Criminal Court ("ICC") was established by the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (the "Rome Statute") to exercise jurisdiction over the most serious crimes of concern to the international community as a whole. Article V identifies them as genocide, crimes against humanity and war crimes - collectively international crimes - and defines them in articles VI, VII and VIII respectively. Article V also foreshadows the crime of aggression, which remains to be defined. The Rome Statute affirms that these crimes must not go unpunished and that their effective prosecution must be ensured by taking measures at the national level and by enhancing international co-operation.1 In addition to the jurisdiction of national courts to prosecute these crimes the Rome Statute confers jurisdiction on the ICC to try such crimes and convict and sentence those who commit such crimes. It is a matter of pride to citizens of this country that South Africa was the first African state to sign the Rome Statute. It did this on 17 July 1998 and ratified it on 27 November 2000. It incorporated it into the domestic law of South Africa in terms of section 231(4) of the Constitution by enacting the Implementation of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court Act 27 of 2002 (the "Implementation Act"). The Rome Statute is annexed to the Implementation Act as a matter of information.

[2] Chapter 4 of the Implementation Act provides the mechanism whereby South Africa co-operates with the ICC in regard to the arrest and surrender of persons accused of international crimes. The failure by the applicants, to whom I will, in accordance with the terminology of their Counsel, refer collectively as the Government, to pursue those mechanisms to arrest the president of Sudan, Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir ("President Al Bashir"), when he was in Johannesburg on 14 and 15 June 2015 to attend the 25th ordinary session of the Assembly of the Africa Union ("AU"), gave rise to the present litigation.

[3] President Al Bashir is a controversial figure as a result of the actions of his government and their supporters, such as the Janjaweed Militia, principally in Darfur, but also elsewhere in Sudan. On 31 March 2005, the Security Council of the United Nations adopted Resolution 1593 (2005). It noted the report of the International Commission of Inquiry on violations of international humanitarian law and human rights law in Darfur, and decided to refer the situation in Darfur since 1 July 2002 to the Prosecutor of the ICC. As a result of the investigations by the ICC, President Al Bashir stands accused of serious international crimes. The Pre-Trial Chamber of the ICC has issued two warrants for his arrest. The first warrant was issued on 4 March 2009 and related to charges of war crimes and crimes against humanity. The second warrant was issued on 12 July 2010 and related to charges of genocide. The warrants have been forwarded to all countries that are parties to the Rome Statute, including South Africa, with a request that they co-operate under the Rome Statute and cause President Al Bashir to be arrested and surrendered to the ICC. Sudan is not a party to the Rome Statute.

[4] When President Al Bashir arrived in South Africa to attend the AU assembly in June 2015 the Government took no steps to arrest him. Indeed it adopted, and continues to adopt, the stance that it was obliged not to do so as President Al Bashir enjoyed immunity from such arrest. I will revert to the grounds for it taking this stance in due course. Its failure to do so resulted in the respondent, the South African Litigation Centre ("SALC"), bringing an urgent application on Sunday 14 June 2015, in the Gauteng Division of the High Court, Pretoria (to which I shall refer as the "High Court"), seeking orders declaring the failure to take steps to arrest President Al Bashir to be in breach of the Constitution and to compel the Government to cause President Al Bashir to be arrested and surrendered to the ICC to stand trial pursuant to the two warrants.

[5] The Government opposed the urgent application and sought and obtained a postponement until 11:30am on Monday, 15 June 2015 to enable affidavits to be prepared. But there was an obvious concern that President Al Bashir might leave the country in the interim in order to escape arrest. Accordingly, in granting the postponement, the High Court made the following order:

"1. President Omar Al Bashir of Sudan is prohibited from leaving the Republic of South Africa until a final order is made in this application, and the respondents are directed to take all necessary steps to prevent him from doing so;

2. The eighth respondent, the Director-General of Home Affairs is ordered:

2.1 to effect service of this order on the official in charge of each and every point of entry into, and exit from, the Republic; and

[6] At the hearing the following day before a specially constituted Full Court of three judges presided over by Judge President Mlambo, it stood down further because the affidavits were not yet ready. The hearing commenced at about 1pm and the Court sought the assurance from Counsel then leading for the Government, Mr W Mokhari SC, that President Al Bashir was still in the country. He informed the Court that according to his instructions President Al Bashir was still in the country and this was repeated during the course of the argument. At about 3pm, the Court made the following order:

"1. That the conduct of the Respondents to the extent that they have failed to take steps to arrest and/or detain the President of the Republic of Sudan Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir (President Bashir), is inconsistent with the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996, and invalid;

2. That the respondents are forthwith compelled to take all reasonable steps to prepare to arrest President Bashir without a warrant in terms of section 40(1)(k) of the Criminal Procedure Act 51 of 1977 and detain him, pending a formal request for his surrender from the International Criminal Court;

[7] Immediately after this order was made, Counsel for the Government told the Court that President Al Bashir had left the country earlier that day. According to an affidavit later filed by the Director-General: Home Affairs, the eighth applicant, he appears to have left on a flight from Waterkloof Air Base at about 11:30 am that morning. The affidavit failed to explain how a head of state, using a military air base reserved for the use of dignitaries, could possibly have left the country unobserved. The Director-General said that President Al Bashir's passport was not among those shown to officials of his department, but as an explanation that is simply risible. Senior officials representing Government must have been aware of President Al Bashir's movements and his departure, the possibility of which had been mooted in the press. In those circumstances, the assurances that he was still in the country given to the Court at the commencement and during the course of argument were false. There seem to be only two possibilities. Either the representatives of Government set out to mislead the Court and misled Counsel in giving instructions, or the representatives and Counsel misled the Court. Whichever is the true explanation, a matter no doubt being investigated by the appropriate authorities, it was disgraceful conduct.

[8] Largely because of President Al Bashir's departure the High Court refused leave to appeal, saying that the litigation had become moot. On petition to this Court it ordered that the application for leave to appeal be set down for argument in terms of the provisions of section 17(2)(d) of the Superior Courts Act 10 of 2013. The President of this Court directed that it be set down as an urgent matter before the commencement of the Court's term. The parties were directed to deliver a full record and to be prepared to address full argument to us on the merits of the case. It is on that basis that the case is before us.

Litigation history

[10] The Government did not make any attempt to challenge these propositions. Instead, it founded its defence to the application on certain special arrangements that it had made with the AU for the holding of the Assembly in Johannesburg. These were explained in detail in affidavits by Ms Sindane, the second applicant and the Director-General of Justice and Constitutional Development, and Dr Lubisi, the Director-General of the Presidency and the Secretary of Cabinet.

[11] Ms Sindane said that after South Africa agreed to host the AU Summit in June 2015 it entered into an agreement (the "hosting agreement") with the Commission of the AU relating to the material and technical organisation of the various meetings that were to take place at the Summit including the 25th Assembly of the AU. Based on this agreement she said that President Al Bashir had been invited to attend by the AU and not by the South African Government. She then referred to article VIII of the hosting agreement, which was headed "Privileges and Immunities", and read:

"The Government shall afford the members of the Commission and Staff Members, delegates and other representatives of Inter-Governmental Organisations attending the Meetings the privileges and immunities set forth in Sections C and D, Article V and VI of the General Convention on the Privileges and Immunities of the OAU."

[12] On 5 June 2015, and pursuant to section 5(3) of the Diplomatic Immunities and Privileges Act 37 of 2001 ("DIPA"), the Minister of International Relations and Co-operation, the fifth applicant, published GN 470 in the *Government Gazette*3 recognising the hosting agreement for the purposes of granting the immunities and privileges as provided for in article VIII, which was annexed to the notice. Dr Lubisi testified that the matter was discussed at a Cabinet meeting where it was decided, after seeking the advice of the Chief State Law Adviser, that "the South African government as the hosting country is first and foremost obliged to uphold and protect the inviolability of President Bashir in accordance with the AU terms and conditions".[4] He added that "Cabinet collectively appreciated and acknowledged that the aforesaid decision can only apply for the duration of the AU Summit."

[13] On this basis, and this basis alone, Ms Sindane claimed that the immunities and privileges referred to in article VIII of the hosting agreement prevented the Government from arresting President Al Bashir "during the duration of the Summit and an additional two days after the conclusion of the Summit". The application was argued on this basis and the High Court quite correctly summarised the issue before it as being "whether a Cabinet resolution coupled with a Ministerial Notice are capable of suspending this country's duty to arrest a head of state against whom the International Criminal Court (ICC) has issued arrest warrants for war crimes, crimes against humanity and genocide".

[14] With the advent of new Counsel, led by Mr JJ Gauntlett SC, an entirely different argument emerged in the application for leave to appeal to this Court. It was now based upon what were said to be the provisions of customary international law and the provisions of section 4(1)(a) of DIPA, which reads:

> "(1) A head of state is immune from the criminal and civil jurisdiction of the Courts of the Republic, and enjoys such privileges as -
> (a) heads of state enjoy in accordance with the rules of customary international law . . . "

[15] The previous argument about the provisions of the hosting agreement and the ministerial notice under section 5(3) of DIPA was relegated to a backseat. Indeed, it was not pursued in that form. Instead, it was said that as the ministerial notice had not been set aside on application to a competent court it continued to be effective to confer immunity on President Al Bashir, even if misconceived.[5]

[16] This change of tack by the Government effectively challenged the foundation of SALC's claim that the Government was under an obligation, by virtue of its accession to the Rome Statute and the enactment of the Implementation Act, to arrest President Al Bashir and surrender him to the ICC. The Government contended that the general immunity that a head of state enjoys under customary international law and section 4(1) of DIPA qualified the obligation of South Africa, that would otherwise exist as a state party to the Rome Statute, to arrest and surrender a head of state for whom the ICC has issued an arrest warrant in respect of the commission of international crimes. The response by SALC was two pronged. It said that the provisions of sections 4(2) and 10(9) of the Implementation Act dealt specifically with these issues and affirmed the obligations of arrest and surrender assumed by South Africa under the Rome Statute. That alone would be decisive, as Mr Trengove SC emphasised in oral argument, but, if not, SALC joined issue with the Government on whether the rules of customary international law relied on by the Government in support of the claim to immunity afforded immunity to a head of state charged with international crimes before the ICC.

[17] Five parties applied to be admitted as amici curiae and permitted to present written and oral submissions to the Court. One, the Helen Suzman Foundation (the "Foundation"), was granted such leave in advance of the hearing. The applications by the other four[6] were not submitted timeously as required by rule 16 of the rules of this Court. Nor were they dealt with by the President or Acting President as contemplated by the same rule. As this created uncertainty, the presiding judge, in consultation with the remaining members of the Court, permitted them to deliver written argument and to make oral submissions at the hearing encompassing both whether they should be admitted as amici and the merits. An application by two of them, the African Centre for Justice and Peace Studies and the International Refugee Rights Initiative, to submit extensive evidence of what they alleged were atrocities still being committed by and at the behest of President Al Bashir, was however dismissed.[7] It is not and never has been a function of this litigation to determine whether the allegations made against President Al Bashir are well-founded and, even if admissible, evidence concerning his alleged conduct would not assist the Court to resolve the legal issues that confront it.

The issues

[18] The following issues fall to be determined:

(a) Did the departure of President Al Bashir render the issues moot?

(b) Should leave to appeal be granted?

(c) Should the four amici other than the Foundation, or any of them, be given leave to intervene as amici?

(d) Did article VIII of the hosting agreement, together with the ministerial proclamation, provide President Al Bashir with such immunity, at least for so long as the proclamation was not set aside?

(e) If not, was President Al Bashir entitled to immunity from arrest and surrender in terms of the arrest warrants issued by the ICC by virtue of customary international law and section 4(1) of DIPA?

(f) If President Al Bashir would ordinarily have been entitled to such immunity did the provisions of the Implementation Act remove that immunity?

(g) If not, have Security Council Resolution 1593 (2005) and the Genocide Convention (1948) removed his immunity?

(h) If the appeal does not succeed, should the order stand or should it be varied in certain respects?

(i) What orders should be made in respect of costs?

Is the appeal moot?

[19] The High Court based its refusal of leave to appeal on section 16(2)(a)(i) of the Superior Courts Act 10 of 2013 (the "Superior Courts Act"), which provides that when at the hearing of an appeal the issues are of such a nature that the decision sought will have no practical effect or result, the court may dismiss the appeal on that ground alone. The High Court reasoned that because President Al Bashir had left the country the case no longer presented a live controversy. It cited Janse van Rensburg NO v

Minister of Trade and Industry and another NNO[8] in support of that proposition. But that case and others like it[9] dealt with situations where the legislation, the constitutional validity of which was the subject of the litigation, had been repealed or replaced by different legislation. That is very different from the present case. Here a declaration had been made that the Government's conduct breached the Constitution and the legislation in point is very much in force. The central issue is what effect it has on the important question whether South Africa is obliged to arrest and surrender to the ICC the head of state of a foreign nation, who has been charged with international crimes before the ICC.

[20] It is correct that no present effect can be given to the order that the Government take steps to prepare to arrest President Al Bashir, because he is not in South Africa. But the order remains in existence and SALC indicated that any attempt by President Al Bashir to return to this country would prompt it to seek its enforcement. As such the order had a continuing effect that would have to be taken into account by the Government in the future conduct of its diplomatic relations. This was well illustrated by certain newspaper reports that were annexed to the opposing affidavit in the application for leave to appeal. These indicated that the South African government had wanted to invite President Al Bashir to a Forum on China-Africa Co-operation to be held in this country in December 2015, but in view of the High Court's decision had suggested to Sudan that it send someone else to represent it. Any invitation to host future gatherings of AU heads of state, for example, would have to bear the judgment of the High Court in mind and could preclude this country from extending such an invitation.

[21] In those circumstances, the High Court erred in holding that there had ceased to be a live and justiciable controversy between the parties.

Leave to appeal

[22] Apart from its finding that the appeal had become moot the High Court also referred to section 17(1)(a)(i) of the Superior Courts Act and held that an appeal had no reasonable prospect of success. But in reaching that conclusion it did not consider the new basis upon which the Government sought to justify its opposition to SALC's claim. So we do not have the benefit of the High Court's view in regard to those contentions.

[23] After expressing its conclusion on prospects of success the High Court also said that it had no discretion once it reached that conclusion to grant leave to appeal. But it failed to consider the provisions of section 17(1)(a)(ii) of the Superior Courts Act which provide that leave to appeal may be granted, notwithstanding the Court's view of the prospects of success, where there are nonetheless compelling reasons why an appeal should be heard. This is linked to the question of mootness. In that regard there is established jurisprudence in this Court that holds that even where an appeal has become moot the Court has a discretion to hear and dispose of it on its merits. The usual ground for exercising that discretion in favour of dealing with it on the merits is that the case raises a discrete issue of public importance that will have an effect on future matters.[10] That jurisprudence should have been considered as a guide to whether, notwithstanding the High Court's view of an appeal's prospects of success, leave to appeal should have been granted. In my view, it clearly pointed in favour of leave to appeal being granted.

[24] That is not to say that merely because the High Court determines an issue of public importance it must grant leave to appeal. The merits of the appeal remain vitally important and will often be decisive. Furthermore, where the purpose of the appeal is to raise fresh arguments that have not been canvassed before the High Court, consideration must be given to whether the interests of justice favour the grant of leave to appeal. It has frequently been said by the Constitutional Court that it is undesirable for it as the highest court of appeal in South Africa to be asked to decide legal issues as a court of both first and last instance. That is equally true of this Court. But there is another consideration. It is that if a point of law emerges from the undisputed facts before the court it is undesirable that the case be determined without considering that point of law. The reason is that it may lead to the case being decided on the basis of a legal error on the part of one of the parties in failing to identify and raise the point at an appropriate earlier stage.[11] But the court must be satisfied that the point truly emerges on the papers, that the facts relevant to the legal point have been fully canvassed and that no prejudice will be occasioned to the other parties by permitting the point to be raised and argued.[12]

reasonable prospects of success and they were forcefully and cogently argued before us. In those circumstances, leave to appeal should be granted.

Amici

[26] Applications for admission as amici curiae in this Court have hitherto been dealt with ad hoc and the provisions of the rule governing such applications have not yet been the subject of detailed consideration in a judgment. It is as well therefore to deal shortly with this topic. Such applications are made in terms of rule 16 of the rules of this Court.[13] In terms of rule 16(1) if all parties agree to the admission of an amicus they are admitted as such.[14] The rule contemplates that the parties when agreeing to the admission of an amicus will agree on the terms on which the amicus is to be admitted. Under rule 16(2) those are then the terms that govern their admission, subject to the power of the President of the Court to amend or vary those terms under rule 16(3). It is apparent that the terms can relate only to the delivery of written argument, which is limited to 20 pages, because rule 16(8) provides that no amicus has a right to address oral submissions to the Court unless the Court so orders. Given the wording of the rule it is plain that this is a reference to the Court hearing the appeal and not the President when dealing with an application for admission as an amicus. The general experience of the members of this Court is that the President leaves the question of oral argument to the presiding judge or Court hearing the appeal. Accordingly, leave to make oral submissions can only be sought after the written submissions have been delivered and the Court has the opportunity of considering whether hearing oral submissions from the amicus will assist in its deliberations. If an amicus seeks leave to make oral submissions it must set out the grounds therefor in its written argument.

[27] Adherence to this procedure will ensure that the written argument of the amicus can be considered along with the reading of the record and the consideration of the heads of argument of the parties when the members of the Court are engaged in preparing the appeal. It is only then that it will be possible to determine whether the amicus can add anything by way of oral submissions. But the Court will nonetheless consider its argument. Whether it will permit the amicus to make oral submissions will depend upon its assessment of whether those submissions can add anything to an argument already before it in written form.

[28] Where there is no agreement among the parties as to the admission of an amicus it is entitled to seek its admission by way of an application to the President of the Court in terms of rule 16(4). The basis upon which such an application shall be made is set out in rules 16(5) and (6). The rule does not make provision for any opposition to such an application, but the general practice is for the President to invite a response from other parties who oppose the admission. The President then determines the application in accordance with rule 16 and, if the amicus is admitted, determine the terms upon which they are admitted and permitted to deliver written

argument. The rule's constraints on the length of written argument apply unless relaxed by the President.[15]

[29] An amicus is not entitled to submit further evidence to the Court but is confined to the record. That is expressly provided in rule 16(8). It is unnecessary to consider whether there are exceptional circumstances in which the Court hearing the appeal may relax that rule.[16] In making submissions the amicus is not permitted to traverse ground already covered by other parties, but is confined to making submissions on the new contentions that it wishes to place before the Court.[17] In that regard it is apposite to point out that adding additional references, whether to case law or to academic writings, on the matters canvassed in the heads of argument of the litigants, does not amount to advancing new contentions. That obviously does not exclude placing material before the Court to demonstrate that a point of controversy between the parties has been settled by way of an authoritative judgment. It would only be if there had, for example, been an authoritative decision placing a legal issue thought to be controversial beyond dispute that an amicus may include that in its argument. Otherwise it is confined to its new and different contentions and these must be clearly stated.

[30] Finally, new contentions are those that may materially affect the outcome of the case. It is not feasible to be prescriptive in this regard but prospective amici and their advisers must start by considering the nature and scope of the dispute between the parties and, on that basis, determine whether they have distinct submissions to make that may alter the outcome or persuade the Court to adopt a different line of reasoning in determining the outcome of the appeal. Obvious examples would be urging the Court to adopt reasoning based on provisions of the Constitution in construing a statute, where the parties have not taken that course, or a submission that the fundamental legal principles to be applied in determining the dispute are other than those submitted by the parties where their adoption would materially affect the outcome of the case. No doubt others can be imagined.[18]

[31] It is appropriate to comment that the applications appear to have paid little heed to the language of rule 16. In the first place other than that of the Foundation, none of the letters addressed to the Government and

SALC sought to define with any clarity the new contentions that the prospective amici wanted to raise or why they would be of assistance to the Court. The complaints concerning this by the Government in its responses to the requests were in my view generally well-founded.

[32] An even clearer difficulty is that, again with the exception of the Foundation, the letters did not spell out the terms on which the prospective amici sought admission as such. Nor in every case did the response from SALC. It merely indicated its willingness to agree to admit the amici without dealing with the terms upon which they should be admitted. When applications were brought they overlooked the fact that an application to the President of the Court is an application for admission as an amicus, but not an application to be permitted to make oral submissions. It is the Court hearing the appeal that makes that decision. If an amicus wishes to make oral submissions it should indicate that when it submits its written submissions.

[33] The Deputy President of this Court granted the Foundation leave to intervene as an amicus prior to the hearing. While there was some procedural confusion about that order and the Government indicated that it would have opposed it had it been afforded the opportunity to do so,19 it was in my judgment an order that was properly made. The Foundation's approach to the dispute was wholly distinct from that of SALC. The latter approached the case on the basis of its view of the content of customary international law and an interpretation of the relevant provisions of the Implementation Act and DIPA. The Foundation's starting point was the constitutional provisions that make international law part of South African law and from that foundation developed submissions as to the proper construction of section 4(1) of DIPA and its relationship to the obligations undertaken by this country under the Rome Statute and the Implementation Act. These contentions were clearly new and of assistance to the Court in dealing with the merits of the appeal.

[34] Notwithstanding the refusal of their application to submit further evidence to the Court, the African Centre for Justice and Peace Studies and the International Refugee Rights Initiative submitted heads of argument in support of the dismissal of the appeal and Counsel appeared on their behalf. It was unclear from their application that in addition to the further evidence they had any new contentions to advance, because they said that the legal arguments would be addressed by SALC "and there is no need for the applicants to address it any further". The stated purpose of their intervention was to place "vital evidence" before the Court in order "to make it plain to the Court that the only real hope of justice for the victims of Sudan is for President Al-Bashir and the members of his government who have been indicted by the ICC to be arrested and surrendered to the ICC by a third state". Nonetheless on 8 February 2016, four days before the hearing they delivered heads of argument and a bundle of authorities running to some 750 pages.

[35] The purpose of this, according to the heads of argument and as explained by Counsel, was to stress that, in the absence of a remedy before the ICC, victims of international crimes perpetrated by President Al Bashir and persons for whose actions he might be held responsible, would have no effective remedy. But that added nothing to the resolution of the issues before us. The principle of complementarity that underpins the Rome Statute20 makes it clear that the ICC exists to provide a forum for prosecution of international crimes where national courts are unable or unwilling to do so. So, it is apparent that where victims are unable to proceed in their own national court the ICC will necessarily be the tribunal to which they will turn for justice and protection,21 as well as reparations for crimes of which they have been the victims.22

[36] Not only were the matters that these parties sought to raise apparent to the Court from the terms of the Rome Statute itself, but no indication was given of how knowledge of them would affect the determination of the issues in the case. Those involved the construction of a South African statute, DIPA, and the question whether it afforded President Al Bashir

immunity against arrest under the Implementation Act pursuant to the warrants issued by the ICC. For those reasons, the application for admission as amici curiae by the African Centre for Justice and Peace Studies and the International Refugee Rights Initiative must be refused. In view of the valuable work that these organisations perform in their field of activities, and their genuine concern in regard to the issues raised in this case and the background facts giving rise to the ICC's decision to charge President Al Bashir with international crimes, it would be inappropriate to order them to pay any costs incurred by other parties arising out of their application.

[37] Then there is the application by the Peace and Justice Initiative and the Centre for Human Rights. Again there is no doubting their legitimate concerns about events in Sudan and the continuing inability of the ICC to bring President Al Bashir to trial in respect of the charges he faces of having committed international crimes. But legitimate concern over issues providing the background to an appeal is not of itself a justification for admission as an amicus curiae. The prospective amicus must either have the agreement of the other parties, which was not forthcoming in this case, or must satisfy the President of the Court that it is entitled to be so admitted in terms of rule 16.

[38] These two bodies sought to advance argument on five matters set out in their heads of argument. These heads were accompanied by a bundle of documents amounting to a little short of 1000 pages delivered on 8 February 2016. The contentions advanced in the heads of argument differed somewhat from the matters described in their application, but the differences did not appear to be significant. The five matters were the international nature of the crimes and the ICC; the import of Security Council Resolution 1593 (2005); the effect of Sudan and South Africa being a signatory to the Genocide Convention (1948);23 the interpretation of articles 27 and 98 of the Rome Statute, especially in the light of the travaux préparatoires and "the original intent of the drafters"; and the unavailability of fora akin to the ICC with international jurisdiction, in Africa or elsewhere, to prosecute the alleged perpetrators in this case.

[39] The last of these overlapped with the contentions by the African Centre for Justice and Peace Studies and the International Refugee Rights Initiative and does not provide a ground for the admission of these parties as amici. Proof of the content of the travaux préparatoires and "the original intent of the drafters" would require evidence, which is impermissible and leave to lead which was neither sought nor granted. As regards the other three matters they were all dealt with in the arguments of the Government and SALC. They were not new contentions. For those reasons the application for their admission as amici curiae must be refused, but again and for similar reasons no adverse order for costs should follow.

Article VIII of the hosting agreement

[40] This was not only the principal, but also the only, argument advanced by Government before the High Court. It assumed secondary importance when the application for leave to appeal was brought. It was pursued in this Court principally on the footing that until the ministerial proclamation was set aside it afforded President Al Bashir immunity from arrest and surrender under the Implementation Act. I deal with it first in order to stress that, contrary to the Government's criticism, the High Court's understanding of the issue argued before it was undoubtedly correct and to affirm the correctness of its conclusions on that issue.

[41] The High Court gave the argument short shrift. It said that on its terms the hosting agreement conferred immunity on members or staff of the AU Commission and on delegates and other representatives of Inter-Governmental Organisations. This did not include member states or their representatives or delegates. Furthermore the section of DIPA relied on by the Minister in making her proclamation was section 5(3). That section empowered the Minister to confer immunity on:

Plainly, so the High Court held, the section did not cover heads of state or representatives of states attending meetings of the AU, but only the AU itself and other organisations such as the Inter-Governmental Organisations referred to in article VIII. The definition of an organisation in section 1 of DIPA demonstrates that it does not apply to member states but to intergovernmental organisations.

[42] There is little that can be added to that reasoning. I mention the following. Section 5 has the heading "Immunities and privileges of United Nations, specialised agencies and other international organisations". That fortifies the conclusion that a proclamation under the section does not apply to other persons. Second, the hosting agreement is one between South Africa as the host nation and the AU. It is intended to deal with the representatives and officials of the AU and organisations with which it has relationships, not with the position of heads of state and state delegations. If there is to be a special agreement for immunity in respect of such persons it must be made under section 7. Otherwise their right to immunity, if any, will arise by virtue of customary international law and, in South Africa, DIPA. Although section 4(1)(c) of DIPA contemplates the possibility of a section 7 agreement applying to a head of state a careful reading suggests that this relates only to the conferral of additional privileges that the head of state would not otherwise enjoy by virtue of section 4(1)(a).

[43] Counsel for the Government endeavoured to circumvent these difficulties in the following way. Prior to President Al Bashir coming to South Africa

Sudan had requested that he be afforded the privileges and immunities of a delegate attending the AU Summit. The provisions of article VIII of the hosting agreement were promulgated for this purpose. Even if the Minister exceeded her powers in doing so the proclamation remained in force until set aside in terms of the Oudekraal principle.[24] As it had not been set aside it remained effective to confer immunity on President Al Bashir notwithstanding any underlying legal defects in its proclamation.

[44] The difficulty with this contention is that it demands in the first instance that article VIII of the hosting agreement covered President Al Bashir. If it did not it was irrelevant that the Minister thought, or had been advised, that it did. And that in turn depended in the first instance upon President Al Bashir being a delegate to the AU Assembly. But a head of state attending an AU Assembly does not do so as a delegate but as the embodiment of the member state itself. That is apparent from the AU's description of the Assembly on its website as:

> "The Assembly is the African Union's (AU's) supreme organ and comprises Heads of State and Government from all Member States."

[45] The Constitutive Act of the AU makes this perfectly clear. In article 1 it defines "Member State" as being "a Member State of the Union" and the "Assembly" as "the Assembly of Heads of State and Government of the Union". The "Union" is the AU. In terms of article 6.1 it is composed of Heads of State and Government "or their duly accredited representatives". Under article 7.1 decisions of the Assembly are taken by consensus, or failing that by a two-thirds majority of Member States. The AU is composed of member states and the Assembly is its governing body composed of the heads of state or heads of government of the member states. They are the embodiment of the member states not delegates from them. Without the heads of state and heads of government or their representatives there can be no Assembly.

[46] Over and above that difficulty there is no basis for saying that heads of state attending the Assembly were encompassed by the reference to "delegates" in article VIII.1 of the hosting agreement. The agreement was concluded between the AU and the South African government. There is nothing to indicate that the AU was representing the heads of state of member states or their delegations in concluding the agreement or was concerned with their entitlement to immunity when visiting South Africa. That was a matter for the diplomatic relationship between South Africa and other member states, not the AU. It is an agreement relating to the "material and technical organisation" of various meetings including the Assembly. It makes no reference to heads of state in any of its provisions. The key words in article VIII.1 are "the delegates and other representatives of Inter-Governmental Organizations attending the Meetings". That relates only to persons who are there because of their entitlement to be

there on behalf of one or other inter-governmental organisation, not to those who are there on behalf of a member state.25

[47] The necessary conclusion is that President Al Bashir was not a person included in the reference to "delegates" in article VIII.1 of the hosting agreement. As such the hosting agreement did not confer any immunity on President Al Bashir and its proclamation by the Minister of International Relations and Co-operation did not serve to confer any immunity on him. The fact that the Cabinet may have thought that it would is neither here nor there. An erroneous belief cannot transform an absence of immunity into immunity. And, that being so, it was unnecessary for SALC to seek to set the proclamation aside before bringing its application.

[48] The High Court was accordingly correct in the conclusion it reached on the arguments placed before it. It cannot be criticised for not dealing with an argument that was never raised or suggested before it. It was proper therefore for it to make an order in favour of SALC on the issues before it. Whether its order was correct in the light of the new arguments now raised is the matter to which I now turn.

Was there immunity under customary international law and section 4(1) of DIPA?

[49] The argument on behalf of Government ran as follows. It is a well established principle of customary international law that heads of state enjoy immunity ratione personae, that is, by virtue of the office they hold, and are not subject to the criminal or civil jurisdiction of the Courts of other countries or any other form of restraint. In the usual terminology they are regarded as inviolable. This immunity is embodied in section 4(1)(a) of DIPA, which provides:

"A head of state is immune from the criminal and civil jurisdiction of the Courts of the Republic, and enjoys such privileges as -

(a) heads of state enjoy in accordance with the rules of customary international law . . . "

It follows that before the enactment of the Implementation Act President Al Bashir would have enjoyed immunity from arrest and surrender to the ICC notwithstanding South Africa's accession to the Rome Statute.

[50] The Government submitted that the Implementation Act does not remove this immunity. On a proper construction of section 4(2) of the Implementation Act it has nothing to do with immunity from arrest in terms of the ICC warrants, but precludes immunity being advanced as a defence or in mitigation of sentence in a prosecution for international crimes before a South African Court. It does not therefore remove the immunity that a head of state enjoys from arrest in South Africa even for international crimes to be prosecuted before the ICC. As to section 10(9) of the Implementation Act it is concerned only with the surrender of a person properly arrested pursuant to an ICC warrant. It precludes such a person from raising immunity to preclude surrender. But it is silent on the question whether such person may be arrested in the first place. If they were immune from arrest then they should not be arrested and there is no room for an inquiry in terms of section 10(5) of the Implementation Act and therefore no room for applying the exclusion of immunity in section 10(9).

[51] SALC countered this argument in the following way. The Implementation Act was intended to give effect to South Africa's accession to the Rome Statute and South Africa's obligations thereunder. These included the obligation to co-operate with the ICC in causing persons in respect of whom the ICC has issued arrest warrants and requested assistance to be arrested and surrendered. Properly construed, in the light of these obligations, the provisions of sections 4(2) and 10(9) of the Implementation Act preclude anyone, whether in a prosecution before a South African Court, or when arrested pursuant to an ICC warrant, from raising as defence to their prosecution or ground for resisting their arrest and surrender, any form of immunity.

[52] In the alternative, SALC joined issue with the Government on the contents of customary international law. It contended that whatever the position may be in relation to a national court, in the case of an international tribunal, such as the ICC, set up to deal with international crimes, there is no immunity from arrest or prosecution. In regard to the specific situation in Sudan SALC contended that the effect of Security Council Resolution 1593 (2005) was to subject Sudan to the provisions of the Rome Statute, notwithstanding the fact that it has not acceded to it and thereby to compel it to cooperate with the ICC. A consequence of that, and the fact that Sudan was obliged to co-operate fully with the ICC, was that it could not invoke immunity to prevent President Al Bashir from being arrested and surrendered to face trial before the ICC. In regard to the second arrest warrant, which dealt with the crime of genocide, SALC pointed out that Sudan was a party to the Genocide Convention (1948) and as such it contended that it had waived any immunity that its citizens would otherwise have enjoyed for prosecution of crimes falling within the scope of the Convention.

[53] The Foundation's argument took the Constitution as its starting point. It said that under the Constitution the

or an Act of Parliament.[26] Section 231 deals with the legal effect of international agreements, such as the Rome Statute, to which South Africa is a party. Under section 231(4) an international agreement becomes law in South Africa when it is enacted into law by national legislation. So customary international law is to be read in the light of legislation under which South Africa has enacted international agreements into law. When construing section 4(1)(a) of DIPA and its reference to customary international law, it must be read in the light of these constitutional obligations and provisions. The immunity confirmed in section 4(1)(a) of DIPA must therefore be construed in a way that is consistent with the absence of immunity from prosecution for international crimes provided in the Rome Statute.

The Rome Statute

[54] The Rome Statute is an international agreement between the State Parties thereto, directed at the prosecution and sentencing of those responsible for the international crimes of war crimes, genocide and crimes against humanity. The importance of the international struggle to rid the world of these crimes is resoundingly stated in the Preamble in the following terms:

"The States Parties to this Statute,

Conscious that all peoples are united by common bonds, their cultures pieced together in a shared heritage, and concerned that this delicate mosaic may be shattered at any time,

Mindful that during this century millions of children, women and men have been victims of unimaginable atrocities that deeply shock the conscience of humanity,

Recognizing that such grave crimes threaten the peace, security and well-being of the world,

Affirming that the most serious crimes of concern to the international community as a whole must not go unpunished and that their effective prosecution must be ensured by taking measures at the national level and by enhancing international co-operation,

Determined to put an end to impunity for the perpetrators of these crimes and thus to contribute to the prevention of such crimes,

Recalling that it is the duty of every State to exercise its criminal jurisdiction over those responsible for international crimes,

Determined to these ends and for the sake of present and future generations, to establish an independent permanent International Criminal Court in relationship with the United Nations system, with jurisdiction over the most serious crimes of concern to the international community as a whole,

Emphasizing that the International Criminal Court established under this Statute shall be complementary to national criminal jurisdictions,

Resolved to guarantee lasting respect for and the enforcement of international justice,

Have agreed as follows".

[55] Article 1 creates the ICC and gives it the power "to exercise its jurisdiction over persons for the most serious crimes of international concern". Although the Rome Statute was concluded outside the United Nations ("UN") the aim under article 2 is to bring it into relationship with the UN by agreement between the UN and the ICC. The international crimes that are the subject of the ICC's jurisdiction are defined, as is the Court's jurisdiction. In the ordinary course the ICC has jurisdiction over state parties and their nationals and where a non-party state accepts the jurisdiction of the Court.

[56] This jurisdiction is not universal because parties may for various reasons not accede to the Rome Statute.[27] Article 13(b) of the Rome Statute endeavours to address this problem by providing that the ICC may exercise jurisdiction if:

"a situation in which one or more of such crimes appears to have been committed is referred to the Prosecutor by the Security Council acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations."

The Security Council referred the situation in Darfur to the Prosecutor in terms of this provision. While there is debate among commentators as to the full effect of such a referral, it is accepted by all that it confers jurisdiction upon the ICC in respect of the actions of a non-party state and its citizens.[28] UN member states are obliged to accept the authority of the decision by the Security Council to refer the situation in Darfur to the Prosecutor.[29]

[57] Part 9 of the Rome Statute deals comprehensively with the obligations of international co-operation and judicial assistance to the ICC in the performance of its tasks. Article 86 imposes a general obligation to co-operate fully with the Court in the investigation and prosecution of crimes within its jurisdiction. Under article 87.1(a) the ICC may address requests for co-operation to States Parties and under article 88 all States Parties are obliged to have procedures available under national law to enable them to co-operate with the Court.

[58] Article 89 deals with the arrest and surrender of persons to the ICC and its entitlement to request a State to co-operate in securing such arrest and surrender. It is common cause that the ICC has made such a request to South Africa in relation to the arrest warrants issued in respect of President Al Bashir. In urgent cases the ICC may, in terms of article 92, seek the provisional arrest of a person, but that was not the case here, although there appears to have been some confusion over the issue in the application papers and the order made by the High Court. I will revert to that later.

[59] Article 27 of the Rome Statute deals with the possibility that the crime being prosecuted is likely in many instances to have been perpetrated by a state actor, ranging from a head of state to a humble official or soldier, and therefore the possibility would exist of the accused person raising a claim to immunity in accordance with long-established principles of customary international law, to be considered later in this judgment. It reads:

> "1. This Statute shall apply equally to all persons without any distinction based on official capacity. In particular, official capacity as a Head of State or Government, a member of a Government or parliament, an elected representative or a government official shall in no case exempt a person from criminal responsibility under this Statute, nor shall it, in and of itself, constitute a ground for reduction of sentence.
> 2. Immunities or special procedural rules which may attach to the official capacity of a person, whether under national or international law, shall not bar the Court from exercising its jurisdiction over such a person."

The undisputed effect of this provision is that it is not open to a person being prosecuted before the ICC to claim immunity from prosecution or advance a defence of superior orders. It is agreed by all commentators that, because Party States have bound themselves to the Statute including this provision, all Party States have waived any immunity that their nationals would otherwise have enjoyed under customary international law.

[60] One further provision requires discussion. It is article 98 providing that:

> "1. The Court may not proceed with a request for surrender or assistance which would require the requested State to act inconsistently with its obligations under international law with respect to the State or diplomatic immunity of a person or property of a third State, unless the Court can first obtain the co-operation of that third State for the waiver of the immunity.
> 2. The Court may not proceed with a request for surrender which would require the requested State to act inconsistently with its obligations under international agreements pursuant to which the consent of a sending State is required to surrender a person of that State to the Court, unless the Court can first obtain the co-operation of the sending State for the giving of consent for the surrender."

This provision has occasioned much debate. There is a measure of consensus that it deals with requests for surrender or assistance in relation to the nationals, including heads of state, of non-Party States such as Sudan. Beyond that there appear to be two views. The one, espoused by the AU,[30] is that it operates to protect Party States from the obligation to cooperate with requests from the ICC for arrest and surrender or assistance where that would involve their breaching their obligations to respect personal inviolability under customary international law towards non-Party

States.[31] In other words, it provides the justification for African states to refuse to arrest and surrender President Al Bashir, because he is entitled as the head of state of Sudan to immunity ratione personae.[32] The other view is that, as non-Party States and their nationals are ordinarily brought within the jurisdiction of the ICC by way of a Security Council reference under article 13(b), article 27 is thereby made applicable to the non-Party State and therefore it is not open to it to rely on article 98.[33] It is well-recognised that there is a tension between articles 27 and 98 that has not as yet been authoritatively resolved.

[61] South Africa is bound by its obligations under the Rome Statute. It is obliged to co-operate with the ICC and to arrest and surrender to the Court persons in respect of whom the ICC has issued an arrest warrant and a request for assistance. To this end, it passed the Implementation Act. The relationship between that Act and the head of state immunity conferred by customary international law and DIPA lies at the heart of this case. But the starting point is not immediately with these, but with the Constitution.

[62] The Constitution makes international customary law part of the law of South Africa, but it may be amended by legislation.[34] It provides a specific mechanism whereby obligations assumed under international agreements become a part of the law of South Africa.[35] And it decrees that, when interpreting any legislation, the Courts must prefer a reasonable interpretation that is consistent with international law over any alternative interpretation that is inconsistent with international law.[36] As Ngcobo CJ said in Glenister (II):[37]

> "Our Constitution reveals a clear determination to ensure that the Constitution and South African law are interpreted to comply with international law, in particular international human-rights law . . . These provisions of our Constitution demonstrate that international law has a special place in our law which is carefully defined by the Constitution."

[63] The Constitution incorporated these provisions pursuant to the goal stated in the Preamble that its purpose is to "[b]uild a united and democratic South Africa able to take its rightful place as a sovereign state in the family of nations". From being an international pariah South Africa has sought in our democratic state to play a full role as an accepted member of the international community. As part of this aim it enacted the Implementation Act, the preamble to which records that South Africa has become "an integral and accepted member of the community of nations".

[64] The Constitutional Court explained the inter-relationship between South Africa's obligations under international law and its domestic law in National Commissioner of Police v Southern African Human Rights Litigation Centre.[38] The Court was dealing with claims of torture, but its statements also referred to international crimes and are apposite in the context of the present case. Giving the judgment of the Court Majiedt AJ said:

> "[37] Along with torture, the international crimes of piracy, slave-trading, war crimes, crimes against humanity, genocide and apartheid require states, even in the absence of binding international-treaty law, to suppress such conduct because 'all states have an interest as they violate values that constitute the foundation of the world public order'. Torture, whether on the scale of crimes against humanity or not, is a crime in South Africa in terms of s 232 of the Constitution because the customary international law prohibition against torture has the status of a peremptory norm.
> [38] Furthermore, along with genocide and war crimes there is an international treaty law obligation to prosecute torture. The Convention against Torture, an international convention drafted specifically to deal with the crime of torture, obliges states parties to 'ensure that all acts of torture are offences under its criminal law', together with an 'attempt to commit torture' and 'complicity and participation in torture'.
>
> [39] South Africa has fulfilled this international-law obligation through the recent enactment of the Torture Act [Prevention and Combating of Torture of Persons Act 13 of 2013]. In effect, torture is criminalised in South Africa under s 232 of the Constitution and the Torture Act whilst torture on the scale of crimes against humanity is criminalised under s 232 of the Constitution, the Torture Act and the ICC Act . . .
> [40] Because of the international nature of the crime of torture, South Africa, in terms of ss 231(4), 232 and 233 of the Constitution and various international, regional and subregional instruments, is required, where appropriate, to exercise universal jurisdiction in relation to these crimes as they offend against the human conscience and our international-and domestic-law obligations. The exercise of universal jurisdiction is, however, subject to certain limitations."

[65] That passage strongly supports SALC's case that the Government was under an obligation to co-operate with the ICC in arresting President Al Bashir. I did not understand Mr Gauntlett SC to challenge it as a general proposition. His contention was that, as foreshadowed in the final sentence, the principles governing the immunity ratione personae of heads of state constituted a limitation on this exercise of universal jurisdiction that precluded the performance of these obligations in relation to current heads of state.[39] This necessitates a consideration of the nature of immunity in customary international law and, more specifically, the nature of head of state immunity.

[66] Professor Crawford[40] describes the basic principles of the international law of immunity in the following terms:

> "State immunity is a rule of international law that facilitates the performance of public functions of the state and its representatives by preventing them from being sued or prosecuted in foreign Courts. Essentially, it precludes the Courts of the forum state from exercising adjudicative and enforcement jurisdiction in certain classes of case in which a foreign state is a party. It is a procedural bar (not a substantive defence) based on the status and functions of the state or official in question. Previously described as a privilege conferred at the behest of the executive, the grant of immunity is now understood as an obligation under customary international law . . . [T]he existence of this obligation is supported by ample authority . . . Immunity exists as a rule of international law, but its application depends substantially on the law and procedural rules of the forum."

This immunity is available when it is sought to implead a foreign state, whether directly or indirectly,[41] before domestic Courts, and also when action is taken against state officials acting in their capacity as such. They enjoy the same immunity as the state they represent.[42] This is known as immunity ratione materiae (immunity attaching to official acts). In addition, heads of state and certain other high officials of state[43] enjoy immunity ratione personae (immunity by virtue of status or an office held at any particular time). This form of immunity terminates when the individual demits, or is removed from, office. The country concerned may waive either form of immunity.

[67] The Government called these principles in aid in support of its position that President Al Bashir was immune from arrest and surrender in terms of the Implementation Act. It cited the authoritative statements by the International Court of Justice ("ICJ") in the Arrest Warrant case[44] that:

> ". . . [I]n international law it is firmly established that . . . certain holders of High-ranking office in a State, such as the Head of State . . . enjoy immunities from jurisdiction in other States, both civil and criminal.

. . . [T]hroughout the duration of his or her office, he or she when abroad enjoys full immunity from criminal jurisdiction and inviolability. That immunity and inviolability protect the individual concerned against any act of authority of another State which would hinder him or her in the performance of his or her duties."

In regard to a suggestion that, because the case concerned allegations of the commission of international crimes, there was an exception to the principle, the ICJ said (paragraph 58) that it had examined State practice, including national legislation and decisions of higher national courts, but was unable to deduce that there existed under customary international law any exception to this rule where the individual concerned was suspected of having committed war crimes or crimes against humanity. This appears to be accepted by leading commentators such as Professor Akande.[45] It has also been widely accepted by national courts which have rejected attempts to implead sitting heads of state including Prime Minister Sharon of Israel, President Gaddafi of Libya, President Mugabe of Zimbabwe, Prime Minister Thatcher of the United Kingdom, President Castro of Cuba, President Zemin of China, President Kagame of Rwanda and President Aristide of Haiti, while the latter was living in exile in the United States of America.[46]

[68] Dating back to the instrument that established the Nuremberg Trials, it has been a feature of international instruments dealing with the prosecution of international crimes before specially constituted international tribunals, that those tribunals are constituted on the basis of specific provisions excluding claims of immunity as a defence or mitigating circumstance before those tribunals.[47] The ICJ considered these as well (paragraph 58) and found that they likewise did not enable it to conclude that any such exception existed in customary international law in regard to national Courts. But it was urged upon us that customary international law has moved on and at least when it was concerned with international crimes and international tribunals such as the ICC these principles were subject to an exception.

[69] I mean no disrespect to the efforts of Counsel to provide us with a comprehensive body of authority dealing with the issue of immunity in relation to persons charged with international crimes, in not engaging in a comprehensive consideration of the material placed before us. The narrow issue is whether there is now an international crimes exception to the principle of head of state immunity, enabling a state or national court to disregard such immunity when called upon by the ICC to assist in implementing an arrest warrant. The argument proceeded, as does this judgment, on the basis that once a head of state has been brought before the ICC no plea of head of state immunity can be invoked.[48] But, as a number of commentators have pointed out, that does not necessarily mean that a state is entitled to ignore head of state immunity when requested to co-operate with the ICC to bring such a person before it. It is in this context that the question of an international crimes exception to head of state immunity arises.

[70] In the absence of a binding treaty or other international instrument creating such an exception, or an established universal practice in the affairs of nations, one looks to the decisions of international courts for guidance as to the existence of such an exception. But we were referred to no decision by the ICJ itself, qualifying or limiting the scope of its decision in the Arrest Warrant case. Instead, the ICJ appears to have affirmed the decision in its subsequent judgment in Djibouti v France,[49] where it cited the judgment and explained that "the determining feature in assessing whether there has been an attack on the immunity of the Head of State lies in the subjection of the latter to a constraining act of authority". Then in the Jurisdictional Immunities case,[50] after a comprehensive review of both national and international jurisprudence on the point, the ICJ rejected a contention that international law does not recognise immunity, or at least restricts it, in cases involving serious violations of the law of armed conflict. No more recent case from the ICJ was drawn to our attention.

[71] The Jurisdictional Immunities case involved a civil claim by one state against another state, but I can discern nothing in the underlying treatment of customary international law that would justify admitting an exception to head of state immunity for international crimes in the context of criminal proceedings, but denying it in relation to civil proceedings. I am mindful that in some of the reasoning in both Pinochet (3)[51] and Jones[52]

there are passages in which a careful distinction is drawn between civil liability, and the case of criminal liability.[53] But Pinochet (3) was dealing with the criminal liability of a former head of state, not civil liability, and in Jones the House of Lords was concerned with the possible circumvention of state immunity, by permitting personal actions against the officials of the state. Permitting such an action would indirectly infringe the absolute immunity of the foreign state, but indirect infringement does not arise in a criminal case. Of greater relevance in regard to the contention that there is an international crimes exception to head of state immunity is that there are clear statements in Pinochet (3) that if Senator Pinochet had still been the Chilean head of state he would have enjoyed immunity ratione personae.[54] Apart from the point of circumvention of state immunity, it was not suggested that the principles of immunity are different in respect of criminal prosecution of international crimes as opposed to the adjudication of civil claims arising from the perpetration of international crimes. As pointed out by Professor Crawford the immunity afforded to state officials has always been the same as that of the state they represent.[55] And Dame Hazel Fox QC and Philippa Webb say that "Civil immunity can in the last resort . . . be regarded as based on criminal immunity."[56]

[72] In two cases, both relied on by the ICJ in the Jurisdictional Immunities decision, the European Court of Human Rights ("ECHR") has likewise accepted that customary international law is as stated in the Arrest Warrant case insofar as it concerns civil claims. The ICJ cited the following passage from the ECHR decision in Al Adsani:[57]

"Notwithstanding the special character of the prohibition of torture in international law, the Court is unable to discern in the international instruments, judicial authorities or other materials before it any firm basis for concluding that, as a matter of international law, a State no longer enjoys immunity from civil suit in the Courts of another State where acts of torture are alleged."

Then in Kalogeropoulou[58] the EHCR said:

"The Court does not find it established, however, that there is yet acceptance in international law of the proposition that States are not entitled to immunity in respect of civil claims for damages brought against them in another State for crimes against humanity."

[73] I can see the force of an argument that the prosecution of perpetrators of international crimes is of greater importance than permitting civil claims arising from their conduct. On the other hand, however, and having regard to the fact that customary international law is derived from the actions of states in their relations with one another, it may be that states would be more willing to accept immunity being withdrawn or attenuated

in relation to claims that sound in monetary terms, than they would to agree to permit their high-ranking office holders and officials to be prosecuted in other national courts. But as I have said no authority to which we were referred drew any distinction between the two situations or suggested that an international crimes exception was accepted in either situation. Professor O'Keefe argues persuasively that there is little likelihood of the acceptance of such an exception in the foreseeable future.[59]

[74] It may be that these considerations will inform future debate and contribute to the development of customary international law, but our task is to assess the state of customary international law as it stands at the present time and apply it. That is what the Constitution requires us to do. While in other areas of the law the Court's function includes the development of the law, in the area of customary international law its task is one of discerning the existing state of the law, not developing it. As Lord Hoffmann said in Jones:[60]

"It is not for a national Court to 'develop' international law by unilaterally adopting a version of that law which, however desirable, forward-looking and reflective of values it may be, is simply not accepted by other states."

Development of customary international law occurs in international courts and tribunals, in the contents of international agreements and treaties and by its general acceptance by the international community of nations in their relations with one another as to the laws that govern that community. However tempting it may be to a domestic court to seek to expand the boundaries of customary international law by domestic judicial decision, it is not in my view permissible for it to do so.

[75] The ICC itself has affirmed that the Arrest Warrant case correctly reflects customary international law in respect of the immunity ratione personae of heads of state. In the DRC case concerning President Al Bashir[61] it said:

"At the outset, the Chamber wishes to make it clear that it is not disputed that under international law a sitting Head of State enjoys personal immunities from criminal jurisdiction and inviolability before national Courts of foreign States even when suspected of having committed one or more of the crimes that fall within the jurisdiction of the Court."

In support of this statement the ICC cited the Arrest Warrant case.

[76] The Arrest Warrant case specifically recognised that there are exceptions to this immunity. The decision mentioned four.[62] The first three were that there is no immunity before a domestic Court; no immunity if it is waived by the State they represent; and no immunity after they demit, or are removed from, office. The fourth bears upon the present case. The ICJ recognised that an incumbent of an office entitled to immunity ratione personae "may be subject to criminal proceedings before certain international criminal Courts, where they have jurisdiction". It mentioned various possible examples of which the ICC was one. The tribunals in question were those the founding statutes of which excluded such immunity as a defence or ground for moderating sentence. Does this provide the exception for which SALC contends? It has the support of at least one of the commentators cited by SALC.[63] But another equally eminent commentator cited by the Government disagrees.[64] No one so far as I can see claims that the matter has been clearly resolved as a matter of customary international law.

[77] There is a difference between saying that an international tribunal, having jurisdiction and constituted on terms that specifically exclude reliance on any principles of immunity, provides an exception to the customary international law rule that heads of state enjoy immunity ratione personae, and saying that a national court asked to provide assistance to that international tribunal is likewise not bound by the customary international law rule. It is the latter proposition with which we are concerned. And it is of great importance that in two instances in dealing with the arrest and surrender of President Al Bashir, the ICC did not found its decisions on that proposition. Instead it held that President Al Bashir does not enjoy any such immunity, because the Security Council removed it by way of Resolution 1593 (2005).

[78] Sudan is not a party to the Rome Statute. It has not therefore undertaken any obligations in relation to the ICC. By contrast a state that is a party to the Rome Statute is bound by its terms. As those include, in article 27, an express provision precluding reliance on immunity it is accepted that party states waive any rights to immunity that their own citizens might otherwise have enjoyed. But the position is different in respect of non-parties. Here the starting point must be that in terms of article 34 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties[65] a treaty such as the Rome Statute cannot impose obligations on states that are not parties to the treaty and have not consented to the imposition of such obligations.

[79] The ICC recognised this difficulty in the DRC case. It also accepted that in the ordinary course the only means of avoiding the difficulty was by invoking article 98 of the Rome Statute, which provides for the ICC to secure the co-operation of the third party state (in this case, Sudan) in waiving immunity and giving consent for the surrender of the person

concerned. The papers do not reveal whether the ICC has made approaches to Sudan to secure a waiver or consent, but given that President Al Bashir is the head of state in that country it is obvious at a practical level that it would not be forthcoming.

[80] In DRC, the ICC held that requiring the DRC to arrest and surrender President Al Bashir did not create an inconsistency between its obligations under the Rome Statute and its international obligation to respect the immunities of President Al Bashir as a head of state. But its reasoning was not based on the existence of an international crimes exception to head of state immunity. It was based entirely on Security Council Resolution 1593 (2005). The ICC reasoned as follows:[66]

"The Chamber does not consider that such inconsistency arises in this case. This is so because by issuing Resolution 1593(2005) the SC[Security Council] decided that the 'Government of Sudan [. . . ] shall cooperate fully with and provide necessary assistance to the Court and the Prosecutor pursuant to this resolution'. Since Immunities attached to Omar Al Bashir are a procedural bar from prosecution before the Court, the co-operation envisaged in said resolution was meant to eliminate any impediment to the proceedings before the Court, including the lifting of immunities. Any other interpretation would render the SC decision requiring that Sudan 'co-operate fully' and 'provide any necessary assistance to the Court' senseless. Accordingly, the 'cooperation of that third party State [Sudan] for the waiver of the immunity' as required under the last sentence of article 98(1) of the Statute, was already ensured by the language used in paragraph 2 of the SC Resolution 1593(2005). By virtue of said paragraph, the SC implicitly waived the immunities granted to Omar Al Bashir under international law and attached to his position as a Head of State." (My emphasis added in italics. Underlined words emphasised in the original.)

[81] In its decision in relation to President Al Bashir's visit to South Africa referred to earlier[67] the ICC repeated this justification for its view that South Africa was not barred by President Al Bashir's status as a head of state from arresting him and causing him to be surrendered to the ICC. It said:[68]

"In conclusion, the Republic of South Africa is already aware of its obligation under the Rome Statute to immediately arrest Omar Al Bashir and surrender him to the Court, as it is aware of the Court's explicit position . . . that the immunities granted to Omar Al Bashir under international law and attached to his position as a Head of State have been implicitly waived by the Security Council of the United Nations by resolution 1593(2005) . . . "(My emphasis.)

[82] These decisions involved a departure by the ICC from its earlier decision holding that there is an international crimes exception to head of state

immunity when a person is charged with international crimes under the Rome Statute.[69] In Malawi[70] the ICC concluded that:

". . . [T]he Chamber finds that customary international law creates an exception to Head of State immunity when international Courts seek a Head of State's arrest for the commission of international crimes."

By contrast on the same question Professor Crawford[71] (since 2015 a judge of the ICJ) wrote, in respect of the ICC, that state parties had consented to the waiver of immunity in respect of their nationals by virtue of their agreement to article 27, but:

"The entitlement of nationals of non-parties to personal immunity is not obviously eroded, particularly in the light of Article 98(1) of the ICC statute."

He noted that the Pre-Trial Chamber held a firm opinion to the contrary, but that was written before the Chamber gave a different justification for its views in regard to President Al Bashir and immunity. Its current position appears to accept that President Al Bashir would enjoy head of state immunity, were it not, so it believes, for the fact that it has been waived by the Security Council.

[83] It would serve little purpose to trawl through the academic literature on the question as the commentators are divided, although one senses a desire on the part of many of them that the problem should be resolved by recognising an exception to the rule of head of state immunity. Were it simply a matter for me to determine I would be inclined to share the view expressed by Dr Weatherall[72] that:

". . . [T]he State is not an abstract entity but a community of human beings. Protection of international criminals . . . from international scrutiny under the guise of State dignity is an affront to the citizens against whom grave violations of human rights are perpetrated. As State sovereignty is increasingly viewed to be contingent upon respect for certain values common to the international community, it is perhaps unsurprising that bare sovereignty is no longer sufficient to absolutely shield High officials from prosecution for jus cogens violations,"

as well as that of the US District Court[73] he quotes:

"These precedents instruct that resort to head-of-state and diplomatic immunity as a shield for private abuses of the sovereign's office is wearing thinner in the eyes of the world and waning in the cover of the law. The prevailing trend teaches that the day does come to pass when those who violate their public trust are called upon, in this world, to render account for the wrongs they inflict on innocents."

[84] But the content of customary international law is not for me to determine and, like Dr Weatherall, I must conclude with regret that it would go too far to say that there is no longer any sovereign immunity for jus cogens (immutable norm) violations. Consideration of the cases and the literature goes no further than showing that Professor Dugard is correct when he says that "customary international law is in a state of flux in respect of immunity, both criminal and civil, for acts of violation of norms of jus cogens".[74] In those circumstances, I am unable to hold that at this stage of the development of customary international law there is an international crimes exception to the immunity and inviolability that heads of state enjoy when visiting foreign countries and before foreign national Courts.

[85] Ordinarily that would mean that President Al Bashir was entitled to inviolability while in South Africa last June. But SALC argued that the position was different as a result of the enactment of the Implementation Act. I turn to consider that contention.

The Implementation Act

[86] Whether the Implementation Act has the effect of removing the immunity that President Al Bashir would otherwise enjoy is a matter of the proper construction of the Implementation Act. The principles to be followed in that regard are settled.[75] In the present case they are strongly influenced by the fact that we are dealing with a statute that incorporated an international agreement into South African law and are required by section 233 of the Constitution to construe it in a manner consistent with international law. As international law requires state parties to international agreements to comply with the obligations they have assumed under those agreements, an interpretation of the Implementation Act that results in South Africa not complying with its obligations under the Rome Statute is to be avoided if possible.

[87] We are also obliged by section 39(2) of the Constitution to interpret the Implementation Act in a way that promotes the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights. There are a number of provisions of the Bill of Rights that inform its spirit, purport and objects in this context. If international crimes were committed in South Africa they would infringe a number of rights guaranteed under the Bill of Rights. Section 11 guarantees the right to life and we are here concerned with an arrest warrant that charges the crime of genocide. The charges of war crimes and crimes against humanity not only infringe that right but they also infringe the right to dignity in section 10 and the right to freedom and security of the person in section 12. Section 12(1) explains that this includes the right not to be deprived of freedom arbitrarily or without just cause; the right not to be detained without trial; the right to be free from all forms of violence from either public or private sources; the right not to be tortured and the right not to be treated in a cruel, inhuman or degrading way. Section 13 guarantees that no one may be subjected to slavery, servitude or forced labour and section 14 protects the right to privacy. Then there are the rights to freedom of religion, belief and opinion; freedom of expression and the right to assembly, demonstration and petition.

[88] Reference to the two arrest warrants show that the conduct of which President Al Bashir stands accused, and for which he is said to be responsible, involves acts that would infringe all of these rights. It is of course not for us to form or express a view on whether the conduct charged occurred or, if it did, his responsibility for it. But I mention it because it illustrates the importance in the context of the interpretation of the Implementation Act of construing it in a way that accords with and gives effect to the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights.

[89] The starting point in the interpretational exercise is the long title of the Implementation Act, which describes its purposes. It reads that it is an Act:

> "To provide for a framework to ensure the effective implementation of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court in South Africa; to ensure that South Africa conforms with its obligations set out in the Statute; to provide for the crime of genocide, crimes against humanity and war crimes; to provide for the prosecution in South African Courts of persons accused of having committed the said crimes in South Africa and beyond the borders of South Africa in certain circumstances; to provide for the arrest of persons accused of having committed the said crimes and their surrender to the said Court in certain circumstances; to provide for co-operation by South Africa with the said Court; and to provide for matters connected therewith."

[90] Some of these features warrant stressing in the light of the fact that there is no dispute that President Al Bashir is subject to the jurisdiction of the ICC and can be prosecuted by it for his alleged crimes. He has been stripped of any immunity when before the ICC. It is therefore important that the purpose of the Implementation Act is to provide a framework to ensure the effective implementation of the Rome Statute. It is to ensure that South Africa conforms to its obligations under the Rome Statute. In that regard there is no doubting its obligation to endeavour to bring President Al Bashir before the ICC for trial. The head of state immunity claimed for him is only a procedural bar to the enforcement of that obligation in this country.[76] It is not an immunity that confers impunity for any wrongdoing on his part.

[91] Lastly, the Implementation Act provides for the arrest of persons accused of international crimes and their surrender to the ICC and for co-operation between this country and the ICC. Those are powerful objectives. The reason for them appears from the preamble where the point is made that

"millions of children, women and men have suffered as a result of atrocities which constitute the crimes of genocide, crimes against humanity, war crimes and the crime of aggression in terms of international law". As a result of this and South Africa's own painful past the Republic of South Africa is committed to:

"* bringing persons who commit such atrocities to justice, either in a Court of law of the Republic in terms of its domestic laws where possible, pursuant to its international obligations to do so when the Republic became party to the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, or in the event of the national prosecuting authority of the Republic declining or being unable to do so, in line with the principle of complementarity as contemplated in the Statute, in the International Criminal Court, created by and functioning in terms of the said Statute; and

* carrying out its other obligations in terms of the said Statute".

[92] The relevant provisions of the Implementation Act must be read and construed in the light of this commitment, which as the Constitutional Court has pointed out, is constitutionally mandated. The first is section 4(2) which provides:

"(2) Despite any other law to the contrary, including customary and conventional international law, the fact that a person -

(a) is or was a head of State or government, a member of a government or parliament, an elected representative or a government official; or

(b) being a member of a security service or armed force, was under a legal obligation to obey a manifestly unlawful order of a government or superior, is neither -

(i) a defence to a crime; nor

[93] In Dugard,[77] it is suggested that this section is an endeavour by the Legislature to "cut past" the controversial issue of immunity ratione personae. I confess to being unpersuaded. The section is in a part of the Implementation Act conferring jurisdiction on South African Courts to try international crimes in certain circumstances. It would have been absurd and non-compliant with its international obligations for South Africa in such a case to permit the accused to raise immunity either ratione personae or ratione materiae, or obedience to orders, to avoid conviction or reduce any sentence. In the circumstances, the section paraphrased the provisions of article 27(1) of the Rome Statute and made them applicable in trials for international crimes in South Africa or, as Professor Du Plessis expressed matters, it "trumps" the immunities that would otherwise attach to individuals.[78] The difficulty lies in taking it further to create in South Africa an international crimes exception to head of state immunity. Nevertheless, that does not mean that it is irrelevant to the interpretational exercise. It is a clear indication that South Africa does not support immunities when people are charged with international crimes.

[94] Recognition of head of state immunity alongside the provisions of sec-tion 4(2) to preclude someone from being brought to trial in South Africa would create an anomaly. Under section 4(3)(c) a South African Court has jurisdiction to try someone for an international crime if they are present in the territory of the Republic. In such a trial it would be no answer for the accused to raise immunity either ratione personae or ratione materiae. But on the argument for the Government this would not matter because it would be impossible for the accused to be brought before the Court in terms of the Criminal Procedure Act 51 of 1977 ("CPA"). Under the CPA an accused is brought to Court either by arrest or indictment,[79] but either procedure would compel the accused to submit to the criminal jurisdiction of a South African Court, which is inconsistent with immunity.

[95] A construction of section 4(2) that would exclude claims of immunity if a person was being tried before a South African Court, but would not exclude immunity in seeking to bring that person to trial before that Court would in my view be a serious anomaly. The ordinary principle of interpretation is that the conferral of a power conveys with it all ancillary powers necessary to achieve the purpose of that power.[80] The purpose of the power to prosecute international crimes in South Africa is to ensure that the perpetrators of such crimes do not go unpunished. In order to achieve that purpose it is necessary for the National Director of Public Prosecutions to have the power not only to prosecute perpetrators before our Courts, but, to that end, to bring them before our Courts. This is also consistent with the constitutional requirement that the Implementation Act be construed in a way that gives effect to South Africa's international law obligations and the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights. The construction proffered on behalf of the Government emasculates the section in relation to international crimes that were perpetrated outside the borders of this country by nationals of other states. That is a construction that would defeat the purposes of the Implementation Act. It is not in my view correct.

[96] I turn then to the provisions of the Implementation Act dealing with requests for assistance from the ICC and, more particularly, requests for assistance in terms of arrest warrants issued by the ICC for the purpose of securing the presence before the Court of alleged perpetrators of international crimes. These are in sections 8 to 10 of the Act. Section 8(1) provides that when a request is received from the ICC for the arrest and surrender of a person for whom it has issued a warrant of arrest it must be referred to the Central Authority. This is defined as the Director-General: Justice and Constitutional Development, the present incumbent of which office is Ms Sindane. The Central Authority must immediately on receipt of the request forward the documents to a magistrate who must endorse the warrant for execution in any part of the Republic.[81] That was what occurred in relation to the request in relation to the first arrest warrant. It was forwarded to the Chief Magistrate, Pretoria, who endorsed it for execution.[82] So far as the record goes that warrant is still extant and operative.

[97] Section 9(3) provides that any warrant endorsed under section 8 must be in the form and executed in a manner as near as possible to that which is prescribed under the laws relating to criminal procedure in South Africa. This is the only part of section 9 that bears upon the two warrants in this case. The balance of the section deals with provisional warrants to be sought pursuant to a request by the ICC in terms of article 92 of the Rome Statute. That is irrelevant for the purposes of this case, save that in formulating its claim in the founding affidavit SALC sought to rely on section 9(1) and (2). This misconception appears to some degree to have coloured the relief sought by SALC. It will be dealt with below.

[98] Section 10 deals with the procedures to be followed before a competent court after arrest for the purposes of surrender. Within 48 hours of the person's arrest they must be brought before the magistrate in whose area of jurisdiction the arrest took place. The magistrate then conducts an inquiry in order to establish whether the warrant applies to the person in question; whether the person has been arrested in accordance with the procedures laid down in domestic law; and whether the person's rights as contemplated in the Bill of Rights have been respected, if, and to the extent which, they are or may be applicable.[83] The inquiry is conducted in the same manner as a preparatory examination under the CPA.[84] If, at the end of the inquiry, the magistrate is satisfied of the three matters specified in subsection (1) and that the person may be surrendered to the ICC,[85] then they "must order that such person be surrendered to the Court and that he or she be committed to prison pending such surrender.'[86] There is no scope for the exercise of any discretion in that regard. Provided the requirements for surrender are satisfied then the magistrate must order surrender.

[99] These provisions do not mention the issue of immunity. Nor is it apparent where a claim to immunity could find its place in the inquiry contemplated by section 10(1). The inquiry is expressly confined to the three matters specified and none of those appear to involve issues of immunity. Certainly the question whether the person arrested is the person referred to in the warrant does not raise that as an issue. Similarly, whether the person's arrest complied procedurally with the requirements for a valid arrest in South African domestic law would not raise that issue. When this difficulty was raised with Counsel he suggested that the inquiry became relevant when considering whether the arrested person's rights in terms of the Bill of Rights had been respected and referred to section 12 of the Constitution guaranteeing the right to freedom and security of the person and section 21 governing freedom of movement. But, if the Implementation Act provides for a person's arrest in those circumstances neither of those rights is infringed, or, if they are, the limitation is justified under section 36 of the Constitution. The argument is dependent on the premise that such an arrest would be unlawful because of the existence of immunity. But that begs the very question in issue in this case, namely, whether in relation to an ICC arrest warrant and request for assistance, such immunity exists.

[100] It is here that section 10(9) assumes crucial importance because it deals with the very question of the relevance of claims to immunity to the order of surrender. It provides that:

The persons referred to in section 4(2) include a person who "is or was a head of State". In other words, it includes any person in the situation of President Al Bashir. So the fact that President Al Bashir was such a person would not have provided a ground for a magistrate not to make an order for his surrender in terms of section 10(5).

[101] In an endeavour to circumvent what appears to be a plain provision the Government argued that section 10 deals only with the surrender of persons who had already been arrested under section 9 and that the latter section was silent on the question of immunity. But that creates an absurdity. If it were correct, then any person entitled on any basis to claim immunity would challenge their arrest by way of an interdict de libero homine exhibendo (the equivalent of a habeas corpus application in other jurisdictions) and demand their release. So the only people who could be brought before a magistrate under section 10 would be those who had no grounds for claiming immunity. But then section 10(9) would serve no purpose at all. It would be entirely redundant, because there would be no possible situation in which a person brought before the magistrate under section 10(1) would be a person referred to in section 4(2)(a) or (b). Needless to say such an interpretation is to be avoided.

[102] Counsel contended that to construe the Implementation Act in the manner suggested by SALC involved a tacit repeal or amendment of section 4(2) of DIPA, because that was the prior statute and until the Implementation Act was passed would have served to afford President Al Bashir immunity. He submitted that this is not lightly to be inferred.[87] That is no doubt correct, but there is another principle that emerges from the cases on this point. It was referred to by Marshall J in Gorham v Luckett:[88]

". . . if this last Act professes, or manifestly intends, to regulate the whole subject to which it relates, it necessarily supersedes and repeals all former acts, so far as it differs from them in its prescriptions."

This aptly describes the situation with which we are concerned. DIPA is a general statute dealing with the subject of immunities and privileges enjoyed by various people, including heads of state. The Implementation Act is a specific Act dealing with South Africa's implementation of the Rome Statute. In that special area the Implementation Act must enjoy priority. I would not, however, use the language of repeal or amendment. It is rather more an example of the application of the related principle in the converse situation embodied in the maxim generalia specialibus non derogant (general words and rules do not derogate from special ones).[89] Where there is legislation dealing generally with a topic and, either before or after the enactment of that legislation, the Legislature enacts other legislation dealing with a specific area otherwise covered by the general legislation, the two statutes co-exist alongside one another, each dealing with its own subject matter and without conflict. In both instances, the general statute's reach is limited by the existence of the specific legislation. So DIPA continues to govern the question of head of state immunity, but the Implementation Act excludes such immunity in relation to international crimes and the obligations of South Africa to the ICC.

[103] I conclude therefore that when South Africa decided to implement its obligations under the Rome Statute by passing the Implementation Act it did so on the basis that all forms of immunity, including head of state immunity, would not constitute a bar to the prosecution of international crimes in this country or to South Africa co-operating with the ICC by way of the arrest and surrender of persons charged with such crimes before the ICC, where an arrest warrant had been issued and a request for co-operation made.[90] I accept, in the light of the earlier discussion of head of state immunity, that in doing so South Africa was taking a step that many other nations have not yet taken. If that puts this country in the vanguard of attempts to prevent international crimes and, when they occur, cause the perpetrators to be prosecuted, that seems to me a matter for national pride rather than concern. It is wholly consistent with our commitment to human rights both at a national and an international level. And it does not undermine customary international law, which as a country we are entitled to depart from by statute as stated in section 232 of the Constitution. What is commendable is that it is a departure in a progressive direction.

[104] It is also important to note that this conclusion accords with the understanding of Government as to its obligations under and in terms of the Rome Statute and the Implementation Act. As noted above when South Africa received the first arrest warrant and request for assistance from the ICC, the Central Authority acted in terms of section 8(1) of the Implementation Act and forwarded it to the Chief Magistrate, Pretoria, who endorsed it for execution in any part of the Republic. When President Zuma was inaugurated and an invitation was extended to President Al Bashir to attend the inauguration, Sudan enquired whether he would be liable to arrest if he attended, and the answer was in the affirmative. The then Director-General of the Department of International Relations and Co-operation issued a public statement quoted in the papers, that:

There are several statements in the papers and the literature with which we have been furnished that indicate that there have been other occasions, such as the funeral of the late President Mandela, that President Al Bashir did not attend, because he would have been liable to arrest and surrender to the ICC had he done so. It is plain from this that, save for the circumstances of the present case, South Africa has hitherto complied meticulously with its obligations under the Rome Statute in respect of President Al Bashir.

[105] That brings me back to the point made in paragraphs 11 to 16 and 24 of this judgment that the arguments with which we have been confronted were not those on which the case was conducted in the Court below. Nor, and this is the important point, did they reflect the approach of the Government to the issues. That emerges from the affidavits of Ms Sindane and, in particular, of Dr Lubisi. Ms Sindane explained that the Government's reasons for not seeking to arrest President Al Bashir were based on the terms of the hosting agreement and the ministerial proclamation. And Dr Lubisi explained that "Cabinet collectively appreciated and acknowledged that the aforesaid decision can only apply for the duration of the AU Summit". These statements demonstrated that as far as South Africa was concerned this involved a departure from its commitment to its obligations under the Rome Statute. We have not been apprised of the reasons for South Africa departing from those obligations on this occasion. But, be that as it may, whilst the departure from this country's obligations was unfortunate, according to the affidavits it was only temporary. It is perhaps a pity in those circumstances that the Government chose to pursue the new arguments, thereby possibly giving the impression that our commitment as a nation to the Rome Statute was in question.

Waiver

[106] We received extensive argument on two propositions to the effect that, even if the Implementation Act did not oust President Al Bashir's head of state immunity, it had been waived, either by the Security Council Resolution 1593 (2005) or, in relation to the second arrest warrant, by the Genocide Convention (1948). In view of my conclusion on the effect of the Implementation Act it is unnecessary to address these submissions. The position under the Security Council Resolution is hotly contested by the commentators and the limited argument we received on the Genocide Convention does not give me confidence that we should express a view on it. I pass therefore to a consideration of the relief granted by the High Court and the question of costs.

The relief

[107] The relief granted by the High Court is set out in paragraph 6 above. The matter having been brought and dealt with as an urgent application the orders were not as well-tailored to the contentions being advanced by SALC as mature consideration would indicate. A broad statement that conduct was inconsistent with the Constitution did little to define where the shortcoming lay. Mr Trengove SC accepted that even if the appeal failed it was desirable that the declaratory order be formulated with greater precision. In my view, an appropriate order would have been the following:

"The conduct of the Respondents in failing to take steps to arrest and detain, for surrender to the International Criminal Court, the President of Sudan, Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir, after his arrival in South Africa on 13 June 2015 to attend the 25th Assembly of the African Union, was inconsistent with South Africa's obligations in terms of the Rome Statute and section 10 of the Implementation of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court Act 27 of 2002, and unlawful."

[108] The second paragraph of the order directed the applicants to take reasonable steps to arrest President Al Bashir without a warrant in terms of section 40(1)(k) of the CPA. I do not think that section has anything to do with a person charged with international crimes under the Rome Statute. It is true that it deals with people who have committed crimes outside South Africa that would have been an offence if committed inside South Africa, which would include international crimes. But it is qualified by the requirement that the person arrested is "under any law relating to extradition or fugitive offenders" liable to arrest and detention in South Africa. That is not the position with an arrest under section 10 of the Implementation Act. That Act is not concerned with extradition, but with surrender to the ICC. Persons arrested thereunder are not necessarily fugitive offenders. After all President Al Bashir continues to tread the world stage and has made appearances at the UN and visited China, as well as a number of other states, in his official capacity as head of state of Sudan, so he is not a fugitive offender.

[109] I am not sure why it was thought necessary to look to the CPA in regard to the possible arrest of President Al Bashir. After all the power to arrest him existed under the Implementation Act. Furthermore he was not to be arrested without a warrant, but in terms of warrants endorsed by a magistrate, one of which was in existence at the time, although SALC did not know that. As paragraph 2 of the order sought by SALC and granted by the High Court was inappropriate, and there is at present no reason to think that the existing arrest warrants will not be dealt with in terms of the Implementation Act and be available to be enforced if President Al Bashir returns to this country, it should simply be deleted. Subject to those amendments to the order the appeal should be dismissed.

Costs

[110] The amendments to the order do not represent substantial success for the applicants. While their arguments in regard to the content of customary international law as it applies under DIPA were accepted, the key statute is the Implementation Act and their arguments in regard to that were unsuccessful. SALC have succeeded in establishing important points of public importance in regard to the Government's obligations under the Rome Statute and the Implementation Act. They should accordingly have their costs, including the costs of two Counsel.

[111] The Foundation's arguments were of great value in dealing with this case and the emphasis they rightly placed on the importance of the Constitution in construing the statutes under consideration was a valuable insight. In my view, they should also have their costs including the costs of the application for admission as amicus curiae and the costs of two Counsel.

[112] As regards the costs incurred by the amici other than the Foundation and the costs of the Government in opposing their applications for admission as amici I have already expressed the view that the amici should not be penalised for their lack of success in securing their admission as amici. The Government must bear its own costs in relation to these applications, as must the amici.

Result

[113] I make the following order:

1. The application for leave to appeal is granted.
2. The applicants are to pay the costs of that application such costs to include those consequent upon the employment of two Counsel.
3. The applications by the African Centre for Justice and Peace Studies, the International Immigration Rights Initiative, the Peace and Justice Initiative and the Centre for Human Rights for admission as amici curiae are dismissed with no order for costs.

4. The order of the High Court is varied to read as follows:

   "1 The conduct of the Respondents in failing to take steps to arrest and detain, for surrender to the International Criminal Court, the President of Sudan, Omar Hassan Ahmad Al Bashir, after his arrival in South Africa on 13 June 2015 to attend the 25th Assembly of the African Union, was inconsistent with South Africa's obligations in terms of the Rome Statute and section 10 of the Implementation of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court Act 27 of 2002, and unlawful.

   2 The applicant is entitled to the costs of the application on a pro bono basis."

5. The appeal is otherwise dismissed.

6. The applicants are to pay the respondent's costs of appeal and the costs of the Helen Suzman Foundation, including the costs of its application for admission as an amicus, such costs to include in both instances the costs consequent upon the employment of two Counsel.

(Majiedt and Shongwe JJA concurred in the judgment of Wallis JA. Lewis and Ponnan JJA concurred for separate reasons in the judgment of Wallis JA.)

Ponnan JA:

[114] I have had the privilege of reading the judgment of Wallis JA, which comprehensively sets out the facts and issues that call for adjudication in the appeal. I feel persuaded to write separately in this matter. Both my approach and the line that I take in endeavouring to resolve it are far narrower than and, in their emphasis, different from that preferred by my learned Colleague.

[115] I agree with Wallis JA that the content of customary international law is not for us to determine.91 Nor can I fault his conclusion that:

> "when South Africa decided to implement its obligations under the Rome Statute by passing the Implementation Act it did so on the basis that all forms of immunity, including head of State immunity, would not constitute a bar to the prosecution of international crimes in this country or to South Africa cooperating with the ICC by way of the arrest and surrender of persons charged with such crimes before the ICC, where an arrest warrant had been issued and a request for co-operation made".92

With due deference to my learned Colleague, that conclusion, I daresay, renders his discussion on customary international law unnecessary. I am accordingly hesitant to endorse Wallis JA's discussion on customary international law as also his conclusion on the subject, the high water mark of which is:

> "In those circumstances I am unable to hold that at this stage of the development of customary international law there is an international crimes exception to the immunity and inviolability that heads of State enjoy when visiting foreign countries and before foreign national courts."93

[116] More narrowly then, at the heart of the appeal lies the supposed clash between section 4(1)(a) of the DIPA and section 4(2) of the Implementation Act. The clash is said to arise because the former provision recognises an immunity that the latter purportedly negates. Harmonising that clash - a clash that seems to me to be more apparent than real - necessarily disposes of the primary issue in the appeal.

[117] Section 4(1)(a) of the DIPA provides:

> "A head of State is immune from the criminal and civil jurisdiction of the courts of the Republic, and enjoys such privileges as -
> (a) heads of State enjoy in accordance with the rules of customary international law . . . "

Supposing there was no further legislation, President Al Bashir would have enjoyed immunity from arrest and surrender to the ICC. But there is further and later legislation in the form of the Implementation Act, sec-tion 4(2) of which provides:

> "Despite any other law to the contrary, including customary and conventional international law, the fact that a person -
> (a) is or was a head of State or government, a member of a government or parliament, an elected representative or a government official; or
>
> (b) being a member of a security service or armed force, was under a legal obligation to obey a manifestly unlawful order of a government or superior, is neither -
>
> (i) a defence to a crime; nor

[118] In my view, the apparent conflict can reasonably be reconciled when one applies the appropriate rules of statutory construction. Generally speaking, when the repeal of former legislation is intended, specific words to that effect are employed, but this, however desirable, is not always done, nor is it absolutely necessary. For, as Kotze AJA observed in a separate concurring judgment in New Modderfontein Gold Mining Co v Transvaal Provincial Administration 1919 AD 367 at 397:

> "There are many illustrations in the books of the repeal by implication of earlier statutes by later ones, for subsequent legislation repeals previous inconsistent legislation, whether it expressly declares such repeal or not. Such an implied repeal will arise wherever the contents and operation of a later Act are repugnant to or cannot be harmonized with those of an earlier one . . ."

But repeal by implication is not favoured. An interpretation of apparently conflicting statutory provisions which involve the implied repeal of the earlier by the later ought not to be adopted unless it is inevitable (R v Durban Corporation 1946 NPD 109 at 115). Any reasonable construction which offers an escape from that is more likely to be in consonance with the real intention of the Legislature (R v Tucker 1953 (3) SA 150 (A) at 162 [also reported at [1953] 3 All SA 258 (A) - Ed]). As it was put in Wendywood Developments (Pty) Ltd v Rieger and another 1971 (3) SA 28 (A) at 38 [also reported at [1971] 3 All SA 103 (A) - Ed]:

> "It is necessary to bear in mind a well-known principle of statutory construction, namely, that statutes must be read together and the later one must not be so construed as to repeal the provisions of the earlier one, unless the later > statute expressly alters the provisions of the earlier one or such alteration is a necessary inference from the terms of the

later statute."

[119] I can draw no such inference in this case particularly when regard is had to the nature, purpose and background of the Implementation Act. The preamble to the Implementation Act records that "throughout the history of human-kind, millions of children, women and men have suffered as a result of atrocities which constitute the crimes of genocide, crimes against humanity, war crimes and the crime of aggression in terms of international law." It commits South Africa to "bringing persons who commit such atrocities to justice" either in our own courts, or, in accordance with the principle of complementarity, in the ICC. Section 3 lists the objects of the Implementation Act as being, amongst others to: ensure that the Rome Statute is effectively implemented in South Africa; ensure that South Africa conforms with its obligations under the Rome Statute; and, enable the Republic to co-operate with the ICC by, inter alia, the surrender of suspects for prosecution before the ICC. Section 4(1) provides that any person who commits any of the international crimes is guilty of an offence and liable to conviction and punishment. Section 4(3) vests our courts with universal jurisdiction over the prosecution of all international crimes, wherever they may be committed, provided only that the accused is present in the Republic.

[120] Sections 8, 9 and 10 of the Implementation Act govern the manner in which an ICC request for the arrest of a suspect must be implemented. They do so in mandatory terms. Section 8 caters for an ICC request for the arrest and the surrender of a suspect. Section 8(1) says that the request "must" be referred to the central authority, namely, the Director-General of Justice. Section 8(2) requires the central authority immediately on receipt of that request to forward it to a magistrate who "must" endorse the warrant of arrest for execution. That has happened here in relation to one of the two warrants. Section 9(3) says that a warrant endorsed in terms of section 8 "must" be in a form and be executed in a manner as near as possible to that prescribed for domestic warrants of arrest in South Africa.

[121] Section 10 then comes into play - subsection (1) provides that the suspect "must" be brought before a magistrate within 48 hours, who "must" hold an inquiry to determine: first, whether the warrant applies to the suspect; second, whether the suspect has been arrested in accordance with our domestic law, and third, whether the suspect's constitutional rights have been respected. According to section 10(5), if the magistrate is satisfied that the three requirements have been met and that the suspect may be surrendered to the ICC, he or she "must" order that the suspect be surrendered to the ICC. Tellingly, these provisions leave no room for the suspect to raise any immunity claim or for the magistrate to inquire into and determine such a claim.

[122] Finally, there is section 10(9) of the Implementation Act, which provides:

There is no imperfection in the language of this provision. Its meaning is clear and unambiguous. It applies to any person contemplated in section 4(2)(a) or (b), which includes a sitting or former head of State. Accordingly, the fact that the suspect is a sitting or former head of State does not constitute a ground for refusing an order contemplated in section 10(5) - that is an order that the suspect be surrendered to the ICC. Recognition of head of State immunity alongside the provisions of section 4(2) to preclude someone from being brought to trial in South Africa would create an intolerable anomaly. In terms of section 4(2) of the Implementation Act, a head of State may be arrested and prosecuted before South African domestic courts. The same head of State may be prosecuted before the ICC in terms of article 27 of the Rome Statute. But, when the ICC requests South Africa to arrest and surrender that head of State to the ICC for prosecution, it would be precluded from doing so by virtue of the suspect's immunity. The immunity would not protect him against arrest and prosecution in South Africa but inexplicably protects him from an arrest in South Africa for surrender to the ICC.

[123] The Legislature has thus made a clear choice in section 10(9) to negate the head of State immunity that might otherwise have stood in the way of the arrest and surrender of President Al Bashir. This is not to suggest that section 4(1)(a) of the DIPA has in any way become obsolete or redundant by virtue of the enactment of the Implementation Act. Both enactments address the matter in a slightly different manner. In my view, section 4(1)(a) of the DIPA falls to be read subject to the provisions of the Implementation Act. Or to put it another way, section 4(1)(a) of the DIPA only finds application insofar as the Implementation Act does not. Thus the immunity contemplated by section 4(1)(a) the DIPA can only be validly invoked if it is not in conflict with the Implementation Act. The Legislature has shown, through the Implementation Act, in what respects the more general immunity conferred by section 4(1)(a) of the DIPA is to be excluded. Any other construction would mean that the provisions of the Implementation Act to which I have referred must simply be ignored. Accordingly, section 4(1)(a) of the DIPA continues to govern head of State immunity unless such immunity is excluded by the operation of the Implementation Act. So construed, section 4(1)(a) of the DIPA and section 4(2) of the Implementation Act can stand side by side.

[124] The issues raised are of considerable constitutional and public importance. On any reckoning, even the rather more discrete point of statutory interpretation adopted in this judgment, the matter is appealable.94 For the rest, I agree with the reasoning and orders proposed by Wallis JA.

In argument, Counsel for the Government suggested that this judgment was given summarily and late at night, likening it to an unopposed application in a motion Court. That characterisation was unjustified. A reading of the judgment shows that it was only delivered after a consultation between the ICC and the Government of South Africa under art 97 of the Rome Statute.

(3) The President may amend the terms, conditions, rights and privileges agreed upon in terms of subrule (1).

Application to be admitted

(4) If the written consent referred to in subrule (1) has not been secured, any person who has an interest in any matter before the Court may apply to the President to be admitted therein as an amicus curiae, and the President may grant such application upon such terms and conditions and with such rights and privileges as he or she may determine.

Time for application

(5) An application pursuant to the provisions of subrule (4) shall be made within one month after the record has been lodged with the registrar.

Format

(6) An application to be admitted as an amicus curiae shall -

(a) briefly describe the interest of the amicus curiae in the proceedings;

(b) briefly identify the position to be adopted by the amicus curiae in the proceedings;

(c) set out the submissions to be advanced by the amicus curiae, their relevance to the proceedings and his or her reasons for believing that the submissions will be useful to the Court and different from those of the other parties.

Argument

(7) (a) An amicus curiae shall have the right to lodge written argument, provided that such written argument does not repeat any matter set forth in the argument of the other parties and raises new contentions which may be useful to the Court.

(b) The heads of argument of an amicus curiae shall not exceed 20 pages unless a judge, on request, otherwise orders.

Limitations

(8) An amicus curiae shall be limited to the record on appeal and may not add thereto and, unless otherwise ordered by the Court, shall not present oral argument.

Filing of heads

(9) An order granting leave to be admitted as an amicus curiae shall specify the date of lodging the written argument of the amicus curiae or any other relevant matter.

Costs

(10) An order of the Court dealing with costs may make provision for the payment of costs incurred by or as a result of the intervention of the amicus curiae."

14 The Constitutional Court has held in respect of its similarly worded rules governing admission as an amicus (r 10) that consent alone is not sufficient and an application must also be made to the Chief Justice. Ex parte Institute for Security Studies: In re S v Basson (CCT30/2003) [2005] ZACC 4; 2006 (6) SA 195 (SCA) paras [6]-[8]. Although Harms Civil Procedure in the Supreme Court (loose-leaf) C16-1 (issue 51) says that this is equally applicable in the SCA that does not accord with the practice in this Court.

15 This is a material difference from the Constitutional Court rule, which does not limit the length of the written submissions of an amicus. Also in that Court it is the Chief Justice who determines whether an amicus is permitted to make oral submissions, although in practice it is understood that the entire Court has input in that decision. Historically the Constitutional Court has been generous in permitting oral representations by amici. Van Loggerenberg and others Erasmus Superior Court Practice (2ed, loose-leaf) Vol 1, B1-30 (Original Service, 2015). In this Court it is plain that the Court constituted to hear the appeal decides whether the amicus may make oral submissions.

16 Compare Children's Institute v Presiding Officer of the Children's Court, Krugersdorp and others (CCT 69/12) [2012] ZACC 25; 2013 (2) SA 620 (CC) [also reported at 2013 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) - Ed]. That dealt with r 16A in the Uniform Rules of Court, which does not contain a provision that an amicus is confined to the record on appeal. In the Constitutional Court an amicus is confined to the record on appeal (r 10(8)) subject to the right in terms of r 31 to submit additional facts that are common cause or otherwise incontrovertible or are of an official, scientific technical or statistical nature and capable of easy verification. The SCA has a limited power to permit the leading of additional evidence on appeal, but the Court has not had to consider whether that power can be exercised on the application of an amicus.

17 In re: Certain Amicus Curiae Applications: Minister of Health and others v Treatment Action Campaign and others 2002 (5) SA 713 (CC) para [5] [also reported at 2002 (10) BCLR 1023 (CC) - Ed] which reads:

> "The role of an amicus is to draw the attention of the Court to relevant matters of law and fact to which attention would not otherwise be drawn. In return for the privilege of participating in the proceedings without having to qualify as a party, an amicus has a special duty to the Court. That duty is to provide cogent and helpful submissions that assist the Court. The amicus must not repeat arguments already made but must raise new contentions; and generally these new contentions must be raised on the data already before the Court. Ordinarily it is inappropriate for an amicus to try to introduce new contentions based on fresh evidence."

18 See generally Koyabe and others v Minister for Home Affairs and others (CCT 53/08) [2009] ZACC 23; 2010 (4) SA 327 (CC) para [80] [also reported as Koyabe and others v Minister for Home Affairs and others (Lawyers for Human Rights as amicus curiae) at 2009 (12) BCLR 1192 (CC) - Ed] where it is stated that:

> "Amici curiae have made and continue to make an invaluable contribution to this Court's jurisprudence. Most, if not all, constitutional matters present issues, the resolution of which will invariably have an impact beyond the parties directly litigating before the Court. Constitutional litigation by its very nature requires the determination of issues squarely in the public interest, and insofar as amici introduce additional, new and relevant perspectives, leading to more nuanced judicial decisions, their participation in litigation is to be welcomed and encouraged."

The qualification to their usefulness must be observed.

19 I have already drawn attention to the fact that r 16 makes no provision for such opposition so that there was nothing untoward in the Deputy President making an order on the application as it stood.

Counsel for the Government did not pursue such an argument, which ignores that these articles are only mentioned in the context of saying that the members of the Commission and Staff Members and delegates and other representatives of Inter-Governmental Organisations are to enjoy those privileges. 90 My colleague Ponnan JA in his separate judgment says that this conclusion, which he shares, may render the discussion on customary international law unnecessary. With respect I do not agree. Until one reaches the conclusion that under customary international law President Al Bashir would ordinarily enjoy immunity a discussion of the relevant provisions of the Implementation Act is irrelevant. One cannot construe the provisions of the Implementation Act as removing an immunity that does not exist. If there was no such immunity, because there is an international crimes exception as contended by SALC, then the relevant sections of the Implementation Act merely reflect the provisions of customary international law and do not depart from them. That is an entirely different interpretation from the one in the body of this judgment and would involve a different analysis of the Implementation Act on the footing that it reflected, not overrode, customary international law.

Chapter VII

A. Introduction

68. The Commission, at its fifty-ninth session (2007), decided to include the topic "Immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction" in its programme of work and appointed Mr. Roman A. Kolodkin as Special Rapporteur.[749] At the same session, the Commission requested the Secretariat to prepare a background study on the topic, which was made available to the Commission at its sixtieth session (2008).[750]

69. The Special Rapporteur submitted three reports. The Commission received and considered the preliminary report at its sixtieth session (2008) and the second and third reports at its sixty-third session (2011).[751] The Commission was unable to consider the topic at its sixty-first (2009) and sixty-second (2010) sessions.[752]

70. The Commission, at its sixty-fourth session (2012), appointed Ms. Concepción Escobar Hernández as Special Rapporteur to replace Mr. Kolodkin, who was no longer a member of the Commission.[753] The Commission received and considered the preliminary report of the Special Rapporteur at the same session (2012), her second report during the sixty-fifth session (2013), her third report during the sixty-sixth session (2014), her fourth report during the sixty-seventh session (2015) and her fifth report, in a partial debate, during the sixty-eighth session (2016).[754] On the basis of the draft articles proposed by the Special Rapporteur in the second, third and fourth reports, the Commission has thus far provisionally adopted six draft articles and commentaries thereto. Draft article 2 on the use of terms is still being developed.[755]

B. Consideration of the topic at the present session

71. The Commission had before it the fifth report of the Special Rapporteur analysing the question of limitations and exceptions to the immunity of State officials from foreign

[749] At its 2940th meeting, on 20 July 2007 (Official Records of the General Assembly, Sixty-second Session, Supplement No. 10 (A/62/10), para. 376). The General Assembly, in paragraph 7 of its resolution 62/66 of 6 December 2007, took note of the decision of the Commission to include the topic in its programme of work. The topic had been included in the long-term programme of work of the Commission during its fifty-eighth session (2006), on the basis of the proposal contained in annex A of the report of the Commission (Official Records of the General Assembly, Sixty-first Session, Supplement No. 10 (A/61/10), para. 257).

[755] See Official Records of the General Assembly, Sixty-eighth Session, Supplement No. 10 (A/68/10), paras. 48-49. At its 3174th meeting, on 7 June 2013, the Commission received the report of the Drafting Committee and provisionally adopted draft articles 1, 3 and 4 and, at its 3193rd to 3196th meetings, on 6 and 7 August 2013, it adopted the commentaries thereto (ibid., Sixty-ninth Session, Supplement No. 10 (A/69/10), paras. 48-49). At its 3231st meeting, on 25 July 2014, the Commission received the report of the Drafting Committee and provisionally adopted draft articles 2 (e) and 5 and, at its 3240th to 3242nd meetings, on 6 and 7 August 2014, it adopted the commentaries thereto. At its 3329th meeting, on 27 July 2016, the Commission provisionally adopted draft articles 2, subparagraph (f), and 6, provisionally adopted by the Drafting Committee and taken note of by the Commission at its sixty-seventh session, and at its 3345th and 3346th meetings, on 11 August 2016, the Commission adopted the commentaries thereto (ibid., Seventy-first Session, Supplement No. 10 (A/71/10), paras. 194-195 and 250 and, ibid., Seventieth Session, Supplement No. 10 (A/70/10), para. 176).

criminal jurisdiction (A/CN.4/701), which it had begun to debate at its sixty-eighth session. The report addressed, in particular, the prior consideration by the Commission of the question of limitations and exceptions to the immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction, offered an analysis of relevant practice, addressed some methodological and conceptual questions related to limitations and exceptions, and considered instances in which the immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction would not apply. The Special Rapporteur drew the conclusion that it had not been possible to determine, on the basis of practice, the existence of a customary rule that allowed for the application of limitations or exceptions in respect of immunity ratione personae, or to identify a trend in favour of such a rule. On the other hand, she came to the conclusion that limitations and exceptions to the immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction did apply to State officials in the context of immunity ratione materiae. As a consequence of the analysis, the report contained a proposal for draft article 7 on crimes in respect of which immunity did not apply.[756]

72. At its sixty-eighth session, given that the report had not been available in all languages, the Commission underlined that the debate on the report would continue in order to be finalized at the present session. Accordingly, the Commission continued its debate on the fifth report at its 3360th to 3365th meetings, on 18, 19, 23, 24, 26 and 30 May 2017, respectively.

73. Following its debate on the report, the Commission, at its 3365th meeting, on 30 May 2017, decided to refer draft article 7, as contained in the Special Rapporteur's fifth report, to the Drafting Committee, taking into account the debate in the Commission.

74. At its 3378th meeting, on 20 July 2017, the Commission considered the report of the Drafting Committee and provisionally adopted draft article 7 (see section C.1 below). Provisional adoption was by recorded vote, with 21 votes in favour, 8 votes against and 1 abstention. The members present voted as follows:

Crimes in respect of which immunity does not apply

1. Immunity shall not apply in relation to the following crimes:

   (a) Genocide, crimes against humanity, war crimes, torture and enforced disappearances;

   (b) Crimes of corruption;

   (c) Crimes that cause harm to persons, including death and serious injury, or to property, when such crimes are committed in the territory of the forum State and the State official is present in said territory at the time that such crimes are committed.

2. Paragraph 1 shall not apply to persons who enjoy immunity ratione personae during their term of office.

3. Paragraphs 1 and 2 are without prejudice to:

   (a) Any provision of a treaty that is binding on the forum State and the State of the official, under which immunity would not be applicable;

77. Informal consultations on immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction, conducted by the Special Rapporteur, were held on 18 July 2017. The informal consultations were open-ended and their aim was to exchange views and share ideas on the procedural aspects of immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction, which will be the subject under consideration in the sixth report of the Special Rapporteur, to be submitted in 2018. The consultations were based on an informal concept paper on procedural provisions and safeguards prepared by the Special Rapporteur. At the 3378th meeting, on 20 July 2017, the Special Rapporteur informed the Commission on the development of the informal consultations.

1. Introduction by the Special Rapporteur of the fifth report

78. The Special Rapporteur recalled that the fifth report, on limitations and exceptions to immunities of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction, dealt with a subject that had been the subject of recurrent debate over the years in the Commission and in the Sixth

Committee, eliciting diverse, and often opposing, views. There was a general desire to proceed cautiously and prudently given the sensitivity of the subject and its importance for States. The report itself had been introduced at the sixty-eighth session of the Commission[757] and had been the subject of a partial debate.[758] The Special Rapporteur noted that, due to the change in composition of the Commission, and in the light of the comments and observations on the report at the sixty-eighth session of the Commission and in the Sixth Committee at the seventy-first session of the General Assembly, she considered it appropriate at the current session to make additional introductory remarks on the report. Accordingly, the Special Rapporteur gave a brief overview of the previous debates on the fifth report in the Commission and the Sixth Committee.

79. Commenting on the fifth report itself, she noted that it followed a similar methodology to previous reports, examining State practice, international jurisprudence, the prior work of the Commission and an analysis of domestic legislation for the present report. The report had also taken into account the information received from Governments in response to questions posed by the Commission and oral statements by States in the Sixth Committee. The Special Rapporteur underlined that the fifth report, like the previous reports, had to be read and understood together with the prior reports on the topic.

80. Building on her presentation at the previous session, which she considered to be an integral part of the prior reports considered by the Commission, the Special Rapporteur highlighted a number of ideas central to the report. First, she noted that the phrase "limitations and exceptions" echoed the different arguments put forward in practice for the non-application of immunity. The Special Rapporteur stressed that the distinction between limitations and exceptions, despite its theoretical and normative value for the systemic interpretation of the immunity regime, had no practical significance, as "limitations" or "exceptions" led to the same consequence, namely the non-application of the legal regime of the immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction in a particular case.

81. Second, the report addressed limitations and exceptions within the specific framework of immunity and within the context of the international legal system as a whole. In that regard, the Special Rapporteur underscored: (a) the interrelationship between immunity and jurisdiction, even though the two were different concepts; (b) the procedural nature of immunity; (c) the distinction between immunity of State officials and State immunity; and (d) the distinction between immunity from foreign criminal jurisdiction and immunity before international criminal courts and tribunals. The report further examined immunity from the point of view of international law as a normative system, in which immunity sought to guarantee respect for sovereign equality of States but had to be balanced against other important values of the international legal system.

82. Third, the report focused on the practice of States, which constituted the cornerstone of the Commission's work. The report examined to what extent practice revealed the existence of customary norms that could be codified, following the basic methodology in the Commission's work on the identification of customary international law. It also analysed whether there existed a trend towards progressive development of norms relating to immunity. Going beyond international jurisprudence and treaties, the report studied domestic legislation and decisions of domestic courts. The report also analysed the issues from a systemic perspective, thereby considering the regime of immunity in relation to other aspects of the contemporary international legal system, understood as a whole.

83. On those bases, the report concluded that it had not been possible to determine the existence of a customary rule that allowed for the application of limitations or exceptions in respect of immunity ratione personae, or to identify a trend in favour of such a rule. On the other hand, the report concluded that limitations and exceptions to the immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction were extant in the context of immunity ratione materiae. Although varied, the practice showed a clear trend towards considering the commission of international crimes as a bar to the application of immunity ratione materiae of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction, for the reason that such crimes did not constitute official acts, that the crimes concerned were grave or that they undermined the values and principles recognized by the international community as a whole.

84. Finally, the Special Rapporteur noted that the Commission should approach the topic of immunity from foreign criminal jurisdiction, and in particular the question of limitations and exceptions, from the perspectives of both codification and the progressive development of international law. The challenge for the Commission was to decide whether to support a developing trend in the field of immunity, or whether to halt such development.

85. The Special Rapporteur also made specific comments on the proposed draft article 7. The three paragraphs of the draft article sought to address, in an integral fashion, all the elements that defined the regime of limitations and exceptions to immunity.

86. Paragraph 1 identified crimes to which immunity would not apply. Following the model of the United Nations Convention on Jurisdictional Immunities of States and Their Property, the expression "does not apply" was used to capture both limitations and exceptions. The paragraph identified situations in which immunity did not apply by reference to the crimes over which jurisdiction was sought, namely in case of (a) international crimes; (b) crimes of corruption; and (c) the so-called "territorial tort" exception.

87. Paragraph 2 defined the scope of limitations and exceptions. It specified that the limitations and exceptions in paragraph 1 did not apply to the persons who enjoyed immunity ratione personae, namely Heads of State, Heads of Government and Ministers for Foreign Affairs. It emphasized, however, that the enjoyment of immunity ratione personae was time-bound, which meant that the limitations and exceptions to immunity would apply to the troika once they had left office.

88. Paragraph 3 contained a without-prejudice provision in respect of situations covered by special regimes. The first subparagraph related to instances in which immunity of officials was not applicable due to the existence of treaty relations between the States concerned. The second subparagraph covered cases in which immunity might be affected by a general obligation to cooperate with an international criminal court. Both of those situations stemmed from examples in practice.

89. With regard to the future work of the Commission on the topic, the Special Rapporteur indicated her intention to conduct informal consultations on various procedural matters relating to the topic, during the present session of the Commission. It was hoped that such consultations would further inform the content of her sixth report, to be submitted during the seventieth session of the Commission.

2. Summary of the debate

90. The debate at the present session was a continuation of the discussion on the fifth report, which had commenced at the sixty-eighth session of the Commission. The summary below should be read in combination with the summary of the topic in the report of the Commission on the work of its sixty-eighth session.

(a) General comments

91. Members commended the Special Rapporteur for her rich and well-documented fifth report, which offered a thoughtful analysis of State practice as reflected in treaties and domestic legislation, as well as in international and domestic case law. Members also recalled, with appreciation, the work by the former Special Rapporteur, as well as the study by the Secretariat. Members acknowledged the complex and contentious nature of the topic, in particular the question of limitations and exceptions. The comments made focused generally on methodological and conceptual issues raised in the fifth report, including on the methodology and treatment of State practice, the mandate of the Commission in the progressive development of international law and its codification, the regime of immunity in the international legal system as a whole, as well as the interrelationship between the question of limitations and exceptions and procedural aspects.

92. Several members expressed their appreciation for the detailed and comprehensive analysis of State practice contained in the fifth report. Some members noted their support for the methodology of the Special Rapporteur and maintained that the report provided a firm foundation for the proposed draft article.

93. Other members stated that, while the discussion of practice was extensive, it remained unclear how it related to the specific limitations and exceptions contained in draft article 7. Some members also questioned whether the report, while not finding coherent practice against the non-applicability of immunity, contained sufficient evidence to support the limitations and exceptions to immunity that it proposed. It was noted that many of the examples cited in the report related to State immunity or immunity in civil proceedings, rather than criminal prosecutions. In the view of some members, the report selectively discussed cases that supported the establishment of limitations and exceptions to immunities, while ignoring evidence indicating the opposite. It was noted that the examples in the report were taken from different contexts and time periods and did not demonstrate a linear development towards restrictions on immunity.

94. Members disagreed on the extent and the relevance of treaty practice with regard to limitations and exceptions to immunity. Some members asserted that treaty practice did not establish a trend towards restricting the immunity of foreign State officials. In their view, few treaties provided for limitations and exceptions, and any practice in regard to those treaties could not be counted towards the existence of a customary rule. It was pointed out that many treaties, including treaties relating to diplomatic and consular relations, as well as those relating to international crimes, did not provide for limitations or exceptions. Moreover, a number of members noted that treaties providing for individual responsibility in the case of international crimes, even where they denied immunity before international courts, did not affect the immunity of foreign officials before domestic courts.

95. Other members asserted that treaty practice had marked a deliberate move towards limitations and exceptions of immunity of State officials. Some members placed that development within the context of the work of the Commission on individual criminal responsibility, noting that relevant instruments, such as the Principles of International Law Recognized in the Charter of the Nürnberg Tribunal and in the Judgment of the Tribunal, as well as the work on the draft Code of Crimes against the Peace and Security of Mankind and international criminal jurisdiction rejected immunity for international crimes. Such members maintained that the present draft article should follow the example of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, which in article 27 declares the irrelevance of official capacity. Reference was also made to the Protocol on Amendments to the Protocol on the Statute of the African Court of Justice and Human Rights (Malabo Protocol), as adopted by the African Union. Furthermore, some members noted that the proliferation of treaties containing a "prosecute or extradite" provision had a bearing on the scope of immunity of State officials. They suggested that the obligation to prosecute international crimes implied a limitation on the scope of immunity of State officials.

96. With regard to domestic legislation, some members noted that there were few examples of domestic laws recognizing limitations and exceptions to immunity of foreign officials, even in cases of international crimes. A few members noted that domestic legislation implementing the Rome Statute typically only dealt with institutional issues or with questions of extradition, rather than immunity. It was highlighted that the few countries whose legislation had contained broader exception clauses had recently revised their laws on immunity of State officials to restrict the scope of the limitations and exceptions.

97. Other members maintained that domestic laws reflected the trend indicated by the Special Rapporteur. The view was expressed that even if domestic legislation often focused on State immunity, at least it demonstrated a trend towards the restriction of immunity. Some members noted that the domestic implementation of the Rome Statute had a direct effect on the regime of immunity in domestic courts.

98. Several members criticized the small number of domestic cases examined in the fifth report. It was noted that many of the cases had been overturned or did not relate to immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction, but to State immunity or immunity in civil proceedings. Some members asserted that the report should have examined the reasons why immunity had been declined or upheld in particular cases; should have analysed cases in which prosecutors had decided not to prosecute due to the immunity of the official involved; and should have considered cases in which States had unsuccessfully invoked immunity.

99. A number of members maintained that the small sample of domestic cases analysed in the report did not affect its substantive analysis. The Special Rapporteur was encouraged to further consider regional practice, including, for example, case law from Asia and the jurisprudence of the Inter-American Court of Human Rights.

100. Several members stressed that the trend in international jurisprudence ran counter to the conclusions drawn in the fifth report. It was emphasized that international and regional courts had repeatedly upheld immunity, even in cases involving international crimes or violations of peremptory norms of international law (jus cogens). International jurisprudence had underlined that immunity, which was procedural in nature, was not affected by the gravity of an act. A number of members also emphasized the difference between international and domestic courts. They maintained that the lack of immunity before international criminal tribunals did not entail the non-application of immunity in domestic courts. It was pointed out that international tribunals had only recognized the denial of immunity by domestic courts in cases that related to cooperation with such tribunals.

101. Other members asserted that the analysis of international jurisprudence by the Special Rapporteur supported her approach to limitations and exceptions of immunity. Several members noted that many of the international decisions upholding immunity did not relate to individual criminal responsibility, but dealt with immunity in civil proceedings, State immunity, officials enjoying immunity ratione personae, or questions of State responsibility. Some members also pointed out that international courts and tribunals had made the application of immunity conditional on the availability of alternative redress; if no such redress was available, immunity could not be upheld. Reference was made to individual and dissenting opinions that emphasized that the requirements of sovereignty should not override the need for accountability, but that a balance should be struck.

Progressive development of international law and its codification

102. In the view of some members, the report could have indicated more clearly whether it sought to determine the scope of existing international law (lex lata), whether it followed an emerging trend towards desirable norms (lex ferenda) or whether it aimed to set out "new law". It was noted that the Commission's dual mandate of codification and progressive development required it to closely follow established practice or to openly assert the progressive nature of its work, respectively. Several members urged the Commission to focus on existing law, rather than to engage in progressive development. It was noted that the Commission was not drafting a new treaty, the rules of which would ultimately be subject to the approval of States, but that it aimed to produce a set of guidelines on current practice, for use by non-specialists involved in domestic prosecutions.

103. In that regard, a number of members criticized the fifth report for the nature in which it asserted the existence of customary international law with regard to limitations and exception, without establishing a solid foundation for that in practice. In the view of several members, the report did not sufficiently highlight the serious disagreements within the Commission and within the Sixth Committee over the substantive and procedural aspects of that issue. It was suggested that, due to such differences, the Commission ought to proceed cautiously.

104. Other members stated that the Commission's work on the question of limitations and exceptions should reflect both codification and progressive development. It was asserted that the fifth report accurately captured the current state of international law on immunity of foreign officials. Such members noted that the lingering uncertainty over the scope of immunity ought to encourage the Commission to provide guidelines on the issue, irrespective of the views of States. The Commission was urged not to forget its commitment to the progressive development of international law, as it had displayed in various earlier instruments. For some of those members, the possibility of developing draft articles to form the basis of a treaty on the subject could not be discounted at this stage.

105. Some members questioned whether State practice supported an alleged trend towards limitations and exceptions to immunity of State officials as proposed. Those members maintained that no such trend existed or, if a trend could be discerned, that it pointed in the opposite direction. It was recalled that several States had recently restricted the scope of limitations and exceptions to immunity in their domestic legislation, and international and regional courts had typically upheld the immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction in recent cases.

106. Other members asserted that, even if not all aspects of the report found a firm basis in customary international law, a trend towards limitations and exceptions of immunity ratione materiae did exist. A number of members claimed that developments in the field of State immunity, international criminal law and international human rights law supported such a trend. Moreover, it was asserted that courts and tribunals increasingly refused to apply immunity, either because the alleged acts violated peremptory norms of international law (jus cogens) or because they considered that such acts could not be performed in an official capacity. Further, certain States had expressed their support for restricting the scope of immunity of foreign officials. Some members maintained that the Commission ought to bolster such a trend, in order to fight impunity and lift impediments to the prosecution of international crimes.

International law as a system

107. It was emphasized by some members that the draft articles ought to strike a balance between, on the one hand, the sovereign equality of States and the need for stability in international relations and, on the other hand, the interest of the international community as a whole in preventing and punishing the most serious crimes under international law.

108. Other members expressed concern that the limitations and exceptions to immunity proposed by the Special Rapporteur could foster abuse, for example by enabling politically motivated trials of State officials in foreign jurisdictions. This could weaken stability in international relations and run counter to the cause of fighting impunity and promoting human rights. It was emphasized that, as a fundamental principle of international law, the courts of one State should not sit in judgment over the acts of another State.

109. Several members noted that the system of immunity could and should not stand in the way of the protection of the fundamental interests of the international community. It was emphasized that the protection of human rights and the fight against impunity were not peripheral to the sovereignty of States, but had to be reconciled with it. In the view of such members, perpetrators of international crimes ought not to be allowed to hide behind the cloak of sovereignty to shield themselves from prosecution, as their acts caused severe instability in the countries and regions in which they were perpetrated, eventually affecting the international community as a whole. The point was made that the rules on immunity should not be considered in isolation, but in the light of other norms of the international legal system.

110. Some members noted that the question of limitations and exceptions was closely related to that of procedural aspects of immunity, including procedural safeguards and guarantees. Several members expressed regret that the Special Rapporteur had not submitted a sixth report on that issue at the present session. A number of members suggested that the Commission ought to postpone its work on limitations and exceptions until after the Special Rapporteur had expounded her views on procedural aspects in her sixth report, so that the two issues could be considered in conjunction.

111. It was noted that procedural safeguards could help to strike the necessary balance between the respect for the sovereign equality of States and the need to fight impunity. Several members referred to the work of the previous Special Rapporteur on the topic, who had dealt with various procedural issues relating to timing, invocation, burden of proof and the waiver of immunity. With regard to waiver, some members proposed the establishment of a procedure whereby immunity had to be explicitly invoked by the State of the official; or the establishment of a treaty-based duty to "waive or prosecute", according to which States would have to choose whether to waive immunity in a foreign court or to prosecute the case themselves.

112. Emphasizing the procedural nature of immunity, a number of members noted that, when successfully invoked through diplomatic channels or in courts, immunity suspended the jurisdiction of foreign courts, but did not affect the criminal responsibility of the alleged offenders. Given its preliminary nature, courts had to consider the question of immunity before proceeding to the merits. It was stated that, for this reason, the gravity of an alleged act could have no bearing on the application of immunity, or on its sovereign or official nature. Such members maintained that this did not leave an accountability gap, since, for example, a State, by invoking the immunity of its official and recognizing its acts as its own, would trigger its own responsibility and could be sued itself at the national or international level.

113. Other members maintained that, while a discussion of procedural aspects was very important for the topic as a whole, the Commission first had to identify the substantive features of limitations and exceptions to immunity. It was pointed out that procedural aspects were relevant to the draft articles as a whole and could only be considered after all substantive elements had been discussed. Several members wished not to pre-empt the Commission's debate on the topic of the sixth report and urged the Commission not to delay its consideration of the limitations and exceptions to immunity.

114. A number of members asserted that there was a strong link between immunity and impunity for international crimes. It was pointed out that, if no alternative forum or jurisdiction for prosecution of international crimes was available, the procedural barrier of immunity in domestic courts would entail substantive effects. Some members emphasized that substantive justice should not be the victim of procedural justice, particularly in the case of violations of peremptory norms of international law (jus cogens). Such members cautioned that an exclusively procedural approach to immunity would have a negative impact on the development of individual responsibility in international law.

115. It was noted that the International Criminal Court, the most obvious forum for the prosecution of State officials, did not have the capacity or the resources to prosecute all alleged perpetrators of international crimes. As the Court operated on the basis of complementarity, those members maintained that domestic courts should remain the principal forums for combating impunity. It was also noted that the responsibility of a State for an act did not negate the individual responsibility of an official and should not stand in the way of individual prosecutions.

(b) Specific comments on draft article 7

116. Some members questioned why the proposed title of draft article 7 referred to situations "in respect of which immunity does not apply", when the report discussed "limitations and exceptions" to immunity. It was suggested that the uncertainty over the meaning and scope of the phrase "limitations and exceptions" demonstrated that draft article 7 did not reflect settled international law.

117. A number of members considered that the distinction between limitations and exceptions was useful and should be maintained. It helped to distinguish situations in which immunity was not at issue, because the relevant conduct could not be considered as an official act or as performed in official capacity, from cases in which immunity was excluded on the basis of exceptional circumstances.

118. Other members supported the wording proposed by the Special Rapporteur. It was pointed out that the work on the topic so far had proceeded on the assumption that immunity applied and that draft article 7 should thus deal with its "non-application". Some members noted that a distinction might provide theoretical clarity, but that it had no basis in the practice of States.

119. Some members reiterated their general reservations regarding draft article 7, as proposed. It was suggested that one way forward would be to reformulate the draft article on the basis of an obligation to waive or prosecute core international crimes, which would entail a duty of a State either to waive the immunity of its officials before the courts of a foreign State, or to undertake to fulfil its obligation to prosecute its own officials.

120. A number of members questioned whether the list of crimes included in paragraph 1 was exhaustive or merely illustrative. A suggestion was made to include a general reference to the most serious crimes under international law, rather than including a list of crimes. Some members noted that the paragraph should leave open the possibility of the emergence of new crimes to which immunity would not apply. Other members questioned the basis in customary international law for the crimes listed by the Special Rapporteur, as well as the grounds for including some crimes and not others conceivably within the same genre. It was also suggested that the draft article, or the commentaries thereto, should provide appropriate definitions of the crimes listed.

121. With regard to subparagraph (a), several members expressed their support for the inclusion of the core crimes of genocide, crimes against humanity and war crimes. Some members noted that torture and enforced disappearance, both listed by the Special Rapporteur, fell within the scope of crimes against humanity. Suggestions were made to add the crimes of slavery, apartheid, terrorism and crimes against global cultural heritage.

122. Members further debated whether the crime of aggression should be included in the draft article. Those arguing in favour of inclusion pointed to the prominence of the crime of aggression under the Nürnberg Principles and its pending activation in the Rome Statute. It was also noted that the implementing legislation of some States provided for domestic prosecution of the crime. Other members agreed with the Special Rapporteur that the crime of aggression should be excluded, for the reasons outlined in the fifth report. It was maintained that prosecution of State officials for the crime of aggression by other States would affect the sovereign equality of States, an issue that would not arise in the case of prosecution before an international court.

123. Commenting on subparagraph (b), a number of members questioned whether State practice supported the inclusion of corruption as a limitation or exception to immunity. It was also noted that the text proposed by the Special Rapporteur left the definition and scope of corruption rather vague. Some members maintained that corruption could not be performed in an official capacity, as it was always done with an eye to private gain. In that regard, it was noted that immunity for corruption had already been excluded on the basis of draft article 6. It was suggested that the subparagraph could be removed and that a reference to corruption could be included in the commentaries.

124. Other members supported the inclusion of the crime of corruption in the text of the draft article, noting that the international community had to cooperate to prevent and punish the crime. It was pointed out that domestic courts had often rejected claims for immunity in corruption cases, that many States legislated to prevent and punish corruption, and that corruption had been the subject of various international and regional conventions.

125. Some members emphasized that corruption seriously affected the functioning of public institutions and the rule of law and could significantly impact the socioeconomic situation of domestic populations. It was suggested that the draft article should focus on “grand” or large-scale corruption. A suggestion was made that the subparagraph could indicate what should happen to the proceeds of the crime of corruption when officials were prosecuted in foreign jurisdictions. It was pointed out that that was a matter of the political will of the States involved, but that ordinarily the funds would have to be returned to the country from which they had been taken.

126. Some members noted that the territorial tort exception, on which subparagraph (c) was modelled, was well established in civil proceedings but not in the criminal sphere. It was pointed out that the authorities cited by the Special Rapporteur mostly referred to civil cases and that the report insufficiently examined its applicability in criminal law. Several members mentioned that the concept remained controversial in international law and that the report left a number of issues open, for example its application to military activities and other public acts. In that regard, it was suggested that the subparagraph be formulated more narrowly. Several members referred to the definition proposed by the previous Special Rapporteur on the topic. It was also suggested that the scope of the subparagraph be restricted to specific acts contrary to State sovereignty, such as espionage, political assassination and sabotage.

127. Members generally agreed with the substance of paragraph 2, noting that it reflected existing practice. Members recommended that the commentaries should specify that only the troika of Heads of State, Heads of Government and Ministers for Foreign Affairs could enjoy immunity ratione personae. It was emphasized that, in line with international jurisprudence, immunity ratione personae was without prejudice to the criminal responsibility of those enjoying it. A suggestion was made to indicate that immunity ratione personae did not apply before international courts.

128. Some members suggested that paragraph 2 was superfluous and could be deleted. They proposed to specify in paragraph 1 that the limitations and exceptions listed in the draft article only applied to immunity ratione materiae. Other members preferred to retain the paragraph to highlight the difference between immunity ratione personae and immunity ratione materiae. A suggestion was made to align the temporal scope of the application of immunity ratione personae and immunity ratione materiae with draft articles 4 and 6. Moreover, the view was expressed that immunity ratione personae should be restricted, as it could lead to impunity in cases of lifetime rulers.

129. Several members accepted the inclusion of the without-prejudice clause in paragraph 3. It was noted that, contrary to subparagraph (a), the clause should also apply to treaties under which immunity was applicable. With regard to subparagraph (b), some members considered the reference to an "international tribunal" too vague and suggested that the draft article specify whether that referred to international criminal courts and tribunals, or to any international tribunal. The view was expressed that the paragraph remained prejudicial and should be deleted, as it could potentially affect matters subject to ongoing judicial proceedings.

(c) Future work

130. Many members expressed their anticipation of the sixth report, which would deal with procedural aspects of immunity. It was suggested that the Special Rapporteur should discuss the relationship between immunity and statutes of limitation for crimes to which no limitations or exceptions applied. Some members noted that the Commission should revisit some of the texts provisionally adopted, for example the definition of "immunity from jurisdiction", in order to determine whether it included questions of inviolability.

3. Concluding remarks of the Special Rapporteur

131. In her summary of the debate, the Special Rapporteur expressed her satisfaction with the wide-ranging and interesting discussion that the fifth report had evoked. Responding to some of the criticism on the structure and content of the report, the Special Rapporteur emphasized that all sections of the report were equally relevant to its conclusions. She also noted that it was the substance of the arguments advanced that mattered, not whether she had followed the approach of the previous Special Rapporteur.

132. With regard to the analysis of practice in the fifth report, the Special Rapporteur recalled the various views expressed. She emphasized that the jurisprudence of international courts did not unequivocally exclude the application of limitations and exceptions to immunity ratione materiae, as those decisions primarily dealt with State immunity or immunity ratione personae. She also stressed the importance of national jurisprudence, which, although it might have been limited and not sufficiently homogeneous, was at the heart of the project. She thanked members for suggesting the addition of international, regional and domestic case law.

133. The Special Rapporteur stated the report's analysis of domestic legislation helped differentiate immunity of State officials from State immunity; highlighted the relative nature of State immunity; and illustrated the use of the "territorial tort exception". She also noted that domestic legislation implementing the Rome Statute could shine a light on the question of immunity of State officials, particularly when it went beyond the requirements of the Rome Statute. The Special Rapporteur noted that other forms of State practice, such as decisions by prosecutors or diplomatic demarches, were typically not available in the public domain and could thus not be considered as relevant practice.

134. The Special Rapporteur acknowledged the disagreement between members over a possible customary rule or emerging trend towards limitations and exceptions to immunity of State officials. She maintained that the Commission ought to focus on identifying the relevant rules lex lata and lex ferenda relating to immunity. She did not support the view that the Commission was engaged in crafting "new law" on the issue, as suggested by some members. In that regard, the Special Rapporteur noted that the draft articles, similar to other projects of the Commission, contained elements of both codification and progressive development and that they should be assessed in that light.

135. The Special Rapporteur reiterated her position that the distinction between limitations and exceptions, as set out in the report, helped to illuminate the concept of immunity of State officials and its role within the international legal system. In her view, that approach was not incompatible with the pragmatic formulation of draft article 7, which focused on the situation in which immunity "does not apply"; rather, that formulation avoided a number of controversies relating to the distinction between limitations and exceptions and found its basis in practice.

136. The Special Rapporteur agreed with members that a discussion of the procedural aspects of immunity was of vital importance to the project. She noted, however, that procedural issues went beyond questions of limitations and exceptions, affected the draft articles as a whole and should be dealt with after the Commission had considered the issue of limitations and exceptions to immunity. She pointed out that the previous Special Rapporteur had taken a similar approach and reiterated her offer to hold informal consultations on that matter, in preparation of submission of the sixth report.

137. Turning to specific comments on the draft article proposed in the fifth report, the Special Rapporteur noted that many members were in favour of retaining paragraph 1, although various suggestions for revision of its content had been made. With regard to subparagraph (a), the Special Rapporteur expressed her readiness to include the crime of apartheid, but continued to have reservations regarding the inclusion of other transnational crimes, as the latter were treaty based and did not derive from custom. Moreover, the Special Rapporteur maintained her hesitancy regarding the inclusion of the crime of aggression, as it risked increased politicization of the entire project. For a similar reason, she preferred to maintain a list of specific crimes, rather than including an open, general reference to international crimes. Definitions of the specific crimes could be provided in the commentaries, possibly by reference to existing treaties.

138. The Special Rapporteur noted that the inclusion of corruption in subparagraph (b) remained controversial. She acknowledged that the provision should principally apply to matters of "grand corruption", a term that was to be further specified in the commentaries. She emphasized that, since corruption was always committed for private gain, it could not be considered as an act performed in an official capacity, to which immunity ratione materiae would apply. With regard to the "territorial tort exception", as contained in subparagraph (c), the Special Rapporteur maintained that its application was not restricted to the sphere of civil jurisdiction. In its current form, it aimed at addressing major offences, such as sabotage and espionage.

139. The Special Rapporteur also noted the general agreement on paragraph 2, which highlighted that limitations and exceptions did not apply in case of immunity ratione personae, a well-established position in practice and doctrine. In her view, the explicit reference to immunity ratione personae provided a balance between the principle of sovereign equality and the need to fight impunity, which might be undone were the paragraph deleted. She also expressed her preference for retaining the non-prejudice clauses in paragraph 3, which would facilitate the resolution of any normative conflict between the draft articles and existing international instruments, in particular those relating to international criminal courts and tribunals.

Commentary

(1) Draft article 7 lists crimes under international law in respect of which immunity from foreign criminal jurisdiction ratione materiae shall not apply under the present draft articles. The draft article contains two paragraphs, one that lists the crimes (para. 1) and one that identifies the definition of those crimes (para. 2).

(2) As draft article 7 refers solely to immunity from jurisdiction ratione materiae, it is included in Part Three of the draft articles and does not apply in respect of immunity from jurisdiction ratione personae, which is regulated in Part Two of the draft articles.

(3) This does not mean, however, that the State officials listed in draft article 3 (Heads of State, Heads of Government and Ministers for Foreign Affairs) will always be exempt from the application of draft article 7. On the contrary, it should be borne in mind that, as the Commission has indicated, Heads of State, Heads of Government and Ministers for Foreign Affairs "enjoy immunity ratione personae only during their term of office"[759] and the cessation of such immunity "is without prejudice to the application of the rules of international law concerning immunity ratione materiae".[760] In addition, draft article 6, on immunity ratione materiae, provides that "[i]ndividuals who enjoyed immunity ratione personae ..., whose term of office has come to an end, continue to enjoy immunity with respect to acts performed in an official capacity during such term of office".[761] Accordingly, as this residual immunity is immunity ratione materiae, draft article 7 will be applicable to the immunity from jurisdiction enjoyed by a former Head of State, a former Head of Government or a former Minister for Foreign Affairs for acts performed in an official capacity during their term of office. Therefore, such immunity will not apply to these former officials in connection with the crimes under international law listed in paragraph 1 of draft article 7.

(4) Paragraph 1 of draft article 7 lists the crimes which, if committed, would prevent the application of such immunity from criminal jurisdiction to a foreign official, even if those crimes had been committed by the official acting in an official capacity during his or her term of office. Thus, draft article 7 complements the normative elements of immunity from foreign criminal jurisdiction ratione materiae as defined in draft articles 5 and 6.

(5) The Commission, by a recorded vote, decided to include this draft article for the following reasons. First, it considered that there has been a discernible trend towards limiting the applicability of immunity from jurisdiction ratione materiae in respect of certain types of behaviour that constitute crimes under international law. This trend is reflected in judicial decisions taken by national courts which, even though they do not all follow the same line of reasoning, have not recognized immunity from jurisdiction ratione materiae in relation to certain international crimes.[762] In rare cases, this trend has also been reflected in the adoption of national legislation that provides for exceptions to immunity ratione materiae in relation to the commission of international crimes.[763] This trend has also [762] See the following cases, which are presented in support of such trend: Regina v. Bow Street Metropolitan Stipendiary Magistrate, ex parte Pinochet Ugarte (No. 3), House of Lords, United Kingdom, 24 March 1999, [1999] UKHL 17, [2000] 1 AC 147; Re Pinochet, Belgium, Court of First Instance of Brussels, judgment of 6 November 1998, International Law Reports (ILR), vol. 119, p. 349; In re Hussein, Germany, Higher Regional Court of Cologne, judgment of 16 May 2000, 2 Zs 1330/99, para. 11 (makes this assertion in relation to the hypothesis that the then President Hussein had ceased to hold office); Bouterse, Netherlands, Amsterdam Court of Appeal, judgment of 20 November 2000, Netherlands Yearbook of International Law, vol. 32 (2001), pp. 266 ff. (although the Supreme Court subsequently quashed the verdict, it did not do so in relation to immunity but because of the violation of the principle of non-retroactivity and the limited scope of universal jurisdiction; see judgment of 18 September 2001, International Law in Domestic Courts [ILDC 80 (NL 2001)]); Re Sharon and Yaron, Belgium, Court of Cassation, judgment of 12 February 2003, ILR, vol. 127, p. 123 (although the Court granted immunity ratione personae to Ariel Sharon, it tried Amos Yaron, who, at the time the acts were committed, was head of the Israeli armed forces that took part in the Sabra and Shatila massacres); H. v. Public Prosecutor, Netherlands, Supreme Court, judgment of 8 July 2008, ILDC 1071 (NL 2008), para. 7.2; Lozano v. Italy, Italy, Court of Cassation, judgment of 24 July 2008, ILDC 1085 (IT 2008), para. 6; A. v. Office of the Public Prosecutor of the Confederation, Switzerland, Federal Criminal Court, judgment of 25 July 2012, BB.2011.140; FF v. Director of Public Prosecutions (Prince Nasser case), High Court of Justice, Queen's Bench Division, Divisional Court, judgment of 7 October 2014 [2014] EWHC 3419 (Admin.) (the significance of this ruling lies in the fact that it was issued as a "consent order", that is to say, based on an agreement reached between the plaintiffs and the Director of Public Prosecutions, in which the latter agrees that the charges of torture against Prince Nasser are not covered by immunity ratione materiae). In a civil proceeding, the Italian Supreme Court has also asserted that State officials who have committed international crimes do not enjoy immunity ratione materiae from criminal jurisdiction (Ferrini v. Federal Republic of Germany, Court of Cassation, judgment of 11 March 2004, ILR, vol. 128, p. 674). In Jones, although the House of Lords recognized immunity from civil jurisdiction, it reiterated that immunity from criminal jurisdiction is not applicable in the case of torture (Jones v. Kingdom of Saudi Arabia, House of Lords, judgment of 14 June 2006 [2006] UKHL 26, [2007] 1 A.C.). Lastly, it should be noted that the Federal High Court of Ethiopia, albeit in the context of a case pursued against an Ethiopian national, affirmed the existence of a rule of international law preventing the application of immunity to a former Head of State accused of international crimes (Special Prosecutor v. Hailemariam, Federal High Court, judgment of 9 October 1995, ILDC 555 (ET 1995)). National courts have in some cases tried officials of another State for international crimes without expressly ruling on immunity. This occurred, for example, in the Barbie case before the French courts: Fédération Nationale des Déportés et Internés Résistants et Patriotes and others v. Barbie, France, Court of Cassation, judgments of 6 October 1983, 26 January 1984 and 20 December 1985, ILR, vol. 78, p. 125; Fédération Nationale des Déportés et Internés Résistants et Patriotes and others v. Barbie, Rhone Court of Assizes, judgment of 4 July 1987, ILR, vol. 78, p. 148; and Court of Cassation, judgment of 3 June 1988, ILR, vol. 100, p. 330. Meanwhile, the National High Court of Spain has tried various foreign officials for international crimes without deeming it necessary to rule on immunity, in the Pinochet, Scilingo, Cavallo, Guatemala, Rwanda and Tibet cases. In the Rwanda case, however, the National High Court ruled against the prosecution of President Kagame on the grounds that he enjoyed immunity. Similarly, in the Tibet case, the National High Court ruled against the prosecution of the then President Hu Jintao; however, following the end of the latter's term as President of China, the Central Court of Investigation No. 2 of the National High Court allowed his prosecution by order of 9 October 2013, claiming that he no longer enjoyed "diplomatic immunity".

[763] In support of this position, attention has been drawn to Organic Act No. 16/2015 of 27 October, on the privileges and immunities of foreign States, the international organizations based in Spain and international conferences and meetings held in Spain, which establishes a separate regime of immunity for Heads of State, Heads of Government and Ministers for Foreign Affairs, according to which, in respect of "acts performed in the exercise of official functions [by the officials in question] during a term in office, genocide, forced disappearance, war crimes and crimes against humanity shall be excluded from immunity" (art. 23, para. 1, in fine). Also of interest is Act No. 24488 of Argentina, on foreign State immunity, article 3 of which was excluded by Decree No. 849/95 promulgating the Act, with the result that the Argentine courts may not decline to hear a claim against a State for violation of international human rights law. Meanwhile, from a far more limited perspective, the United States Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act, as amended by the Torture Victim Protection Act, establishes a "terrorism exception to the jurisdictional immunity of a foreign State" (section 1605A), which makes it possible to exclude the application of immunity for certain types of acts such as torture or extrajudicial executions, provided that they were carried out by officials of a State previously designated by the competent authorities of the United States as a "State sponsor of terrorism". A similar exception is contained in the State Immunity Act of Canada. Lastly, it should be borne in mind that some limitations or exceptions to immunity in relation to international crimes are contained in national legislation concerning such crimes, either in separate laws (see the Belgian Repression of Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Act, as amended in 2003; the 2003 International Crimes Act of the Netherlands; or the Criminal Code of the Republic of the Niger, as amended in 2003) or in legislation implementing the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court. For implementing legislation that establishes a general exception to immunity, see: Burkina Faso, Act No. 50 of 2009 on the determination of competence and procedures for application of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court by the jurisdictions of Burkina Faso, arts. 7 and 15.1 (according to which the Burkina Faso courts may exercise jurisdiction with respect to persons who have committed a crime that falls within the competence of the Court, even in cases where it was committed abroad, provided that the suspect is in their territory. Moreover, official status shall not be grounds for exception or reduction of responsibility); Comoros, Act No. 11-022 of 13 December 2011 concerning the application of the Rome Statute, art. 7.2 ("the immunities or special rules of procedure accompanying the official status of a person by virtue of the law or of international law shall not prevent national courts from exercising their competence with regard to that person in relation to the offences specified in this Act"); Ireland, International Criminal Court Act 2006, art. 61.1 ("In accordance with article 27, any diplomatic immunity or state immunity attaching to a person by reason of a connection with a state party to the Statute is not a bar to proceedings under this Act in relation to the person"); Mauritius, International Criminal Court Act 2001, art. 4; South Africa, Act No. 27 of 18 July 2002 implementing the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, arts. 4 (2) (a) (i) and 4 (3) (c) (stating that South African courts are competent to prosecute crimes of genocide, crimes against humanity and war crimes when the alleged perpetrator is in South Africa and that any official status claimed by the accused is irrelevant). For implementing legislation that establishes procedures for consultation or limitations only in relation to the duty to cooperate with the International Criminal Court, see: Argentina, Act No. 26200 implementing the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, adopted by Act No. 25390 and ratified on 16 January 2001, arts. 40 and 41; Australia, International Criminal Court Act No. 41 of 2002, art. 12.4; Austria, Federal Act No. 135 of 13 August 2002 on cooperation with the International Criminal Court, arts. 9.1 and 9.3; Canada, 1999 Extradition Act, art. 18; France, Code of Criminal Procedure (under Act No. 2002-268 of 26 February 2002), art. 627.8; Germany, Courts Constitution Act, arts. 20.1 and 21; Iceland, 2003 Act on the International Criminal Court, art. 20.1; Ireland, 2006 International Criminal Court Act No. 30, art. 6.1; Kenya, Act No. 16 of 2008 on International Crimes, art. 27; Liechtenstein, Act of 20 October 2004 on cooperation with the International Criminal Court and other international tribunals, art. 10.1 (b) and (c); Malta, Extradition Act, art. 26S.1; Norway, Act No. 65 of 15 June 2001 concerning implementation of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court of 17 July 1998 in Norwegian law, art. 2; New Zealand, International Crimes and International Criminal Court Act 2000, art. 31.1; United Kingdom, International Criminal Court Act 2001, art. 23.1; Samoa, Act No. 26 of 2007 on the International Criminal Court, arts. 32.1 and 41; Switzerland, Act on Cooperation with the International Criminal Court, art. 6; and Uganda, Act No. 18 of 2006 on the International Criminal Court, art. 25.1 (a) and (b). Denmark is a special case: its Act of 16 May 2001 on the International Criminal Court (art. 2) attributes the settlement of questions on immunity to the executive branch without defining a specific system for consultations.

[764] The existence of a trend towards limiting immunity for international crimes was noted by Judges Higgins, Kooijmans and Buergenthal in their joint separate opinion in Arrest Warrant of 11 April 2000 (Democratic Republic of the Congo v. Belgium), Judgment, I.C.J. Reports 2002, p. 3, at p. 88, para. 85. For its part, the European Court of Human Rights, in Jones and Others v. the United Kingdom, expressly recognized that there appeared to be "some emerging support in favour of a special rule or exception in public international law in cases concerning civil claims for torture", and that, "in light of the developments currently underway in this area of public international law, this is a matter which needs to be kept under review by Contracting States" (Jones and Others v. the United Kingdom, Applications Nos. 34356/06 and 40528/06, judgment of 2 June 2014, ECHR 2014, paras. 213 and 215).

(6) Second, the Commission also took into account the fact that the draft articles on immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction are intended to apply within an international legal order whose unity and systemic nature cannot be ignored. Therefore, the Commission should not overlook other existing standards or clash with the legal principles enshrined in such important sectors of contemporary international law as international humanitarian law, international human rights law and international criminal law. In this context, the consideration of crimes to which immunity from foreign criminal jurisdiction does not apply must be careful and balanced, taking into account the need to preserve respect for the principle of the sovereign equality of States, to ensure the implementation of the principles of accountability and individual criminal responsibility and to end impunity for the most serious international crimes, which is one of the primary objectives of the international community. Striking this balance will ensure that immunity fulfils the purpose for which it was established (to protect the sovereign equality and legitimate interests of States) and that it is not turned into a procedural mechanism to block all attempts to establish the criminal responsibility of certain individuals (State officials) arising from the commission of the most serious crimes under international law.

(7) In the light of the above two reasons, the Commission considers that it must pursue its mandate of promoting the progressive development and codification of international law by applying both the deductive method and the inductive method. It is on this premise that the Commission has included in draft article 7 a list of crimes to which immunity ratione materiae shall not apply for the following reasons: (a) they are crimes which in practice tend to be considered as crimes not covered by immunity ratione materiae from foreign criminal jurisdiction; and (b) they are crimes under international law that have been identified as the most serious crimes of concern to the international community, and there are international, treaty-based and customary norms relating to their prohibition, including an obligation to take steps to prevent and punish them.

(8) However, some members disagreed with this analysis. First, they opposed draft article 7, which had been adopted by vote, stating that: (a) the Commission should not portray its work as possibly codifying customary international law when, for reasons indicated in the footnotes below, it is clear that national case law,[765] national statutes,[766] and

[765] Those members noted that only nine cases are cited (see footnote 762 above) that purportedly expressly address the issue of immunity ratione materiae of a State official from foreign criminal jurisdiction under customary international law, and that most of those cases actually provide no support for the proposition that such immunity is to be denied. For example, in the United Kingdom case of Regina v. Bow Street Metropolitan Stipendiary Magistrate, immunity was denied only with respect to acts falling within the scope of a treaty in force that was interpreted as waiving immunity (the Convention against Torture). The German case of In re Hussein did not concern any of the crimes listed in draft article 7, and the judgment did not assert, in relation to the hypothesis that the then President Hussein had ceased to hold office, that immunity ratione materiae from jurisdiction was not or should not be recognized in that instance. The Bouterse case was not upheld by the Netherlands Supreme Court and the reasoning of the lower court on immunity remained an untested obiter dictum. The Belgian decision in Re Sharon and Yaron was controversial and led the Parliament thereafter to alter Belgian law, resulting in the Court of Cassation affirming a lack of jurisdiction over the case. The same law was at issue in Re Pinochet before the Court of First Instance of Brussels. In the case of Lozano v. Italy, the foreign State official was accorded, not denied, immunity ratione materiae. The case Special Prosecutor v. Hailemariam concerned prosecution by Ethiopia of one of its own nationals, not of a foreign State official. Other cases cited concern situations where immunity has not been invoked, or has been waived; they provide no support for the proposition that a State official does not enjoy immunity ratione materiae from foreign criminal jurisdiction under customary international law if such immunity is invoked. Further, those members noted that the relevance for the topic of civil cases in national courts must be carefully considered; to the extent they are relevant, they tend not to support the exceptions asserted in draft article 7. For example, the case Ferrini v. Federal Republic of Germany (see footnote 762 above) was found by the International Court of Justice as to be inconsistent with the obligations of Italy under international law. See Jurisdictional Immunities of the State (Germany v. Italy: Greece intervening), Judgment, I.C.J. Reports 2012, p. 99. In the case of Jones v. Kingdom of Saudi Arabia (see footnote 762 above), the House of Lords recognized the immunity of the State official. By contrast, in addition to those cases indicated above, those members pointed to several cases where immunity ratione materiae has been invoked and treaty law[767] do not support the exceptions asserted in draft article 7; (b) the relevant practice showed no "trend", temporal or otherwise, in favour of exceptions to immunity ratione materiae from foreign criminal jurisdiction; (c) immunity is a procedural matter and, consequently, (i) it is not possible to assume that the existence of criminal responsibility for any crimes under international law committed by a State official automatically precludes immunity from foreign criminal jurisdiction; (ii) immunity does not depend on the gravity of the act in question or on the fact that such act is prohibited by the peremptory norm of international law; (iii) the issue of immunity must be considered at an early stage of the exercise of jurisdiction, before the case is considered on the merits;[768] (d) the lack of immunity before an international criminal court is not relevant to the issue of immunity from the jurisdiction of national courts; and (e) the establishment of a new system of exceptions to immunity, if not agreed upon by treaty, will likely harm inter-State relations and risks undermining the international community's objective of ending impunity for the most serious international crimes. Furthermore, these members took the view that the Commission, by proposing draft article 7, was conducting a "normative policy" exercise that bore no relation to either the codification or the progressive development of international law. For those members, draft article 7 is a proposal for "new law" that cannot be considered as either lex lata or desirable progressive development of international law. Second, those members of the Commission also stressed the difference between procedural immunity from foreign jurisdiction, on the one hand, and substantive criminal responsibility, on the other, and maintained that the recognition of exceptions to immunity was neither required nor necessarily appropriate for achieving the required balance. Rather, in the view of those members, impunity can be avoided in situations where a State official accepted by national courts in criminal proceedings. See, for example, Senegal, Prosecutor v. Hissène Habré, Court of Appeal of Dakar, judgment of 4 July 2000, and Court of Cassation, judgment of 20 March 2001; ILR vol. 125, pp. 571-577 (immunity accorded to former head of State); Germany, Jiang Zemin, decision of the Federal Prosecutor General of 24 June 2005, 3 ARP 654/03-2 (same).

766 These members noted that very few national laws addressed the issue of immunity ratione materiae of a State official from foreign criminal jurisdiction under customary international law. As acknowledged in the Special Rapporteur's fifth report on immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction (A/CN.4/701), para. 42: "Immunity of the State or of its officials from jurisdiction is not explicitly regulated in most States. On the contrary, the response to immunity has been left to the courts". Of the few national laws that purportedly address such immunity (Burkina Faso, Comoros, Ireland, Mauritius Niger, Spain, South Africa), none support draft article 7 as it is written. For example, the Spanish Organic Act No. 16/2015 of 27 October, art. 23, para. 1, only addresses the immunity ratione materiae of former Heads of State, Heads of Government and Ministers for Foreign Affairs. Statutes such as the Repression of Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Act, as amended in 2003, of Belgium or the 2003 International Crimes Act of the Netherlands, only provide that immunity shall be denied as recognized under international law, without any further specification. Further, those members observed that national laws implementing an obligation to surrender a State official to the International Criminal Court, arising under the Rome Statute or a decision by the Security Council, are not relevant to the issue of immunity of a State official under customary international law from foreign criminal jurisdiction. Also irrelevant are national laws focused on the immunity of States, such as Act No. 24488 of Argentina, the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act of the United States, and the State Immunity Act of Canada (further, it was noted that the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act was not amended by the Torture Victim Protection Act, which has nothing to do with terrorism).

767 These members noted that none of the global treaties addressing specific types of crimes (e.g., genocide, war crimes, apartheid, torture, enforced disappearance) contain any provision precluding immunity ratione materiae of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction, nor do any of the global treaties addressing specific types of State officials (e.g., diplomats, consular officials, officials on special mission).

768 See, for example, Jurisdictional Immunities of the State (Germany v. Italy: Greece intervening) (see footnote 765 above), p. 137, para. 84 ("customary international law does not treat a State's entitlement to immunity as dependent upon the gravity of the act of which it is accused or the peremptory nature of the rule which it is alleged to have violated"); Arrest Warrant of 1 April 2000 (Democratic Republic of the Congo v. Belgium), Judgment, I.C.J. Reports 2002, p. 25, para. 60 ("Immunity from criminal jurisdiction and individual criminal responsibility are quite separate concepts. While jurisdictional immunity is procedural in nature, criminal responsibility is a question of substantive law").

is prosecuted in his or her own State; is prosecuted in an international court; or is prosecuted in a foreign court after waiver of the immunity. Asserting exceptions to immunity that States have not accepted by treaty or through their widespread practice risks creating severe tensions, if not outright conflict, among States whenever one State exercises criminal jurisdiction over the officials of another based solely on an allegation that a heinous crime has been committed.

(9) It should be borne in mind that these members also expressed the view that no decision can be taken on the issue of limitations and exceptions to immunity until the Commission has taken a position on the issue of procedural safeguards. This opinion was not, however, accepted by the majority of Commission members, who, while recognizing the importance of clearly defining procedural safeguards to prevent abuse in the exercise of foreign criminal jurisdiction over State officials, took the view that the issue of the crimes to which immunity from jurisdiction ratione materiae does not apply can be dealt with separately at the present stage of the Commission's work. Nevertheless, in order to reflect the great importance attached by the Commission to procedural issues in the context of the present topic, it was agreed that the current text of the draft articles should include the following footnote: "At its seventieth session, the Commission will consider the procedural provisions and safeguards applicable to the present draft articles." The footnote marker was inserted after the headings of Part Two (Immunity ratione personae) and Part Three (Immunity ratione materiae) of the draft articles, since procedural provisions and safeguards may refer to both categories of immunity, and should also be considered in relation to the draft articles as a whole.

(10) Paragraph 1 (a)-(f) of draft article 7 lists the crimes under international law which, if allegedly committed, would prevent the application of immunity from criminal jurisdiction to a foreign official, even if the official committed those crimes while acting in an official capacity during his or her term of office. The crimes are as follows: the crime of genocide, crimes against humanity, war crimes, the crime of apartheid, torture and enforced disappearance.

(11) The chapeau of the draft article uses the phrase "shall not apply" in order to reflect the fact that in both practice and doctrine two different interpretations have been followed with regard to whether or not such crimes are to be considered "acts performed in an official capacity". One view is that the commission of such crimes can never be considered a function of the State and they therefore cannot be regarded as "acts performed in an official capacity". The contrary view holds that crimes under international law either require the presence of a State element (torture, enforced disappearance) or else must have been committed with the backing, express or implied, of the State machinery, so that there is a connection with the State, and such crimes can therefore be considered in certain cases as "acts performed in an official capacity".[769] Although the Commission did not find it necessary to come down in favour of one or the other of these interpretations, it noted that some national courts have not applied immunity ratione materiae in the exercise of their criminal jurisdiction in respect of these crimes under international law, either because they do not regard them as an act performed in an official capacity or a characteristic function of the State,[770] or because they take the view that, although crimes under international law may constitute such an act or function, such crimes (by virtue of their gravity or because they

[770] See, for example, the following cases: Re Pinochet, Belgium, Court of First Instance of Brussels, judgment of 6 November 1998 (see footnote 762 above), p. 349; In re Hussein, Germany, Higher Regional Court of Cologne, judgment of 16 May 2000 (see footnote 762 above), para. 11 (makes this assertion in relation to the hypothesis that the then President Hussein had ceased to hold office). A similar argument has also been used in some cases when the question of immunity has been raised before the civil courts. See, for example, Prefecture of Voiotia v. Federal Republic of Germany, Court of First Instance of Livadeia (Greece), judgment of 30 October 1997.

(12) Therefore, bearing in mind that, in practice, the same crime under international law has sometimes been interpreted as a limitation (absence of immunity) or as an exception (exclusion of existing immunity), the Commission considered it preferable to address the topic in terms of the effects resulting from each of these approaches, namely, the non-applicability to such crimes of immunity ratione materiae from foreign criminal jurisdiction that otherwise might be enjoyed by a State official. The Commission opted for this formulation for reasons of clarity and certainty, in order to provide a list of crimes which, even if committed by a State official, would preclude the possibility of immunity from foreign criminal jurisdiction.

(13) To that end, the Commission used the phrase "immunity ... shall not apply", following, mutatis mutandis, the technique once used by the Commission in relation to jurisdictional immunity of the State, when it used the phrase "proceedings in which State immunity cannot be invoked" in a similar context.[772] However, in draft article 7, the Commission decided not to use the phrase "cannot be invoked" in order to avoid the procedural component of that phrase, preferring instead to use the neutral phrase "shall not apply".

(14) The expression "from the exercise of foreign criminal jurisdiction" is included in the chapeau for consistency with the formulation used in draft articles 3 and 5, as provisionally adopted by the Commission.

(15) The expression "crimes under international law" refers to conduct that is criminal under international law whether or not such conduct has been criminalized under national law. The crimes listed in draft article 7 are the crimes of greatest concern to the international community as a whole; there is a broad international consensus on their definition as well as on the existence of an obligation to prevent and punish them. These crimes have been addressed in international treaties and are also prohibited by customary international law.

(16) The expression "crimes under international law" was used previously by the Commission in the Principles of International Law recognized in the Charter of the Nürnberg Tribunal and in the Judgment of the Tribunal[773] and in the 1954 draft Code of [771] As happened, for example, in the case of Eichmann, Israel, Supreme Court, judgment of 29 May 1962, ILR, vol. 36, pp. 309-310. In the Ferrini case, the Italian courts based their ruling on both the gravity of the crimes committed and the fact that the conduct in question was contrary to jus cogens norms (Ferrini v. Federal Republic of Germany, Court of Cassation, judgment of 11 March 2004 (see footnote 762 above), p. 674). In the Lozano case, the Italian Court of Cassation based its denial of immunity on the violation of fundamental rights, which have the status of jus cogens norms and must therefore take precedence over the rules governing immunity (Lozano v. Italy, Italy, Court of Cassation, judgment of 24 July 2008 (see footnote 762 above), para. 6). In A. v. Office of the Public Prosecutor of the Confederation, the Federal Criminal Court of Switzerland based its decision on the existence of a customary prohibition of international crimes that the Swiss legislature considers to be jus cogens; it also pointed out the contradiction between prohibiting such conduct and continuing to recognize immunity ratione materiae that would prevent the launch of an investigation (A. v. Office of the Public Prosecutor of the Confederation, Switzerland, Federal Criminal Court, judgment of 25 July 2012 (see footnote 762 above)).

[772] Draft articles on jurisdictional immunities of States and their property, adopted by the Commission at its forty-third session, Yearbook of the International Law Commission, 1991, p. 33. The Commission used the phrase cited above as the title of part III of those draft articles and reiterated a variant (the "State cannot invoke") in articles 10 to 17 in the same part. For an explanation of the reasons that led the Commission to use this phrase, see, in particular, paragraph (1) of the general commentary to part III (p. 33) and paragraphs (1) to (5) of the commentary to article 10 (pp. 33-34). The United Nations Convention on Jurisdictional Immunities of States and Their Property, done at New York on 2 December 2004 (General Assembly resolution 59/38, annex), likewise uses the phrase "Proceedings in which State immunity cannot be invoked" in the title of part III and the variant "the State cannot invoke" in articles 10 to 17.

[773] See principle I of the Principles of International Law recognized in the Charter of the Nürnberg Tribunal and in the Judgment of the Tribunal: "Any person who commits an act which constitutes a

Offences against the Peace and Security of Mankind.[774] In this context, the Commission took the view that the use of the expression "crimes under international law" means that "international law provides the basis for the criminal characterization" of such crimes and that "the prohibition of such types of behaviour and their punishability are a direct consequence of international law".[775] What follows from this is "the autonomy of international law in the criminal characterization" of such crimes[776] and the fact that "the characterization, or the absence of characterization, of a particular type of behaviour as criminal under national law has no effect on the characterization of that type of behaviour as criminal under international law".[777] Accordingly, the use of the expression "crimes under international law" directly links the list of crimes contained in paragraph 1 of draft article 7 to international law and ensures that the definition of such crimes is understood in accordance with international standards, and any definition established under domestic law to identify cases in which immunity does not apply is irrelevant.

(17) The category of crimes under international law includes (a) the crime of genocide, (b) crimes against humanity and (c) war crimes. The Commission included these crimes among the crimes in respect of which immunity does not apply for two basic reasons. First, these are crimes about which the international community has expressed particular concern, resulting in the adoption of treaties that are at the heart of international criminal law, international human rights law and international humanitarian law, and the international courts have emphasized not only the gravity of these crimes, but also the fact that their prohibition is customary in nature and that committing them may constitute a violation of peremptory norms of general international law (jus cogens). Second, these crimes arise, directly or indirectly, in the judicial practice of States in relation to cases in which the issue of immunity ratione materiae has been raised. Lastly, it should be noted that these three crimes are included in article 5 of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, where they are described as "the most serious crimes of concern to the international community as a whole".[778] Some members noted, however, that the inclusion of those crimes in draft article 7 found little if any support in practice, in national and international jurisprudence or in national legislation.

(18) The Commission decided not to include the crime of aggression at this time, even though it too is included in article 5 of the Rome Statute and is characterized as a crime under the amendments adopted at the Review Conference of the Rome Statute held in Kampala in 2010.[779] The Commission took this decision in view of the nature of the crime of aggression, which would require national courts to determine the existence of a prior act of aggression by the foreign State, as well as the special political dimension of this type of II, document A/2693, p. 150). For its part, article 1, paragraph 2, of the draft Code of Crimes against the Peace and Security of Mankind adopted by the Commission in 1996 states that: "Crimes against the peace and security of mankind are crimes under international law and punishable as such, whether or not they are punishable under national law" (Yearbook ... 1996, vol. II (Part Two), p. 17).

[777] Ibid., para. (10). It should be borne in mind that the Commission, in commenting on principle I of the Nürnberg principles, had stated that: "The general rule underlying Principle I is that international law may impose duties on individuals directly without any interposition of internal law" (Yearbook ... 1950, vol. II, document A/1316, p. 374, para. 99).

[779] See the definition of aggression in article 8 bis, Official Records of the Review Conference of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, Kampala, 31 May-11 June 2010, publication of the International Criminal Court, RC/9/11, resolution 6, "The crime of aggression" (RC/Res.6).

crime,[780] given that it constitutes a "crime of leaders"; and also in view of the fact that the Assembly of States Parties to the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court has not taken a decision to activate the Court's jurisdiction over this crime. However, some members stated that the crime of aggression should have been included in paragraph 1 of draft article 7, as it is the most serious of the crimes under international law, it was previously included by the Commission itself in the 1996 draft Code of Crimes against the Peace and Security of Mankind[781] and it is one of the crimes covered by the Rome Statute. Furthermore, a substantial number of States have included the crime of aggression within their national criminal law.[782] Accordingly, they expressed their opposition to the majority decision of the Commission and reserved their position on the matter.

(19) On the other hand, the Commission considered it necessary to include in paragraph 1 of draft article 7 the crimes of (d) apartheid, (e) torture and (f) enforced disappearance as separate categories of crimes under international law in respect of which immunity does not apply. Although these crimes are included in article 7 of the Rome Statute under the category of crimes against humanity,[783] the Commission took into account the following elements to consider them as separate crimes. First, the crimes of apartheid, torture and enforced disappearance have been the subject of international treaties that establish a special legal regime for each crime for the purposes of prevention, suppression and punishment,[784] which imposes specific obligations on States to take certain measures in their domestic legislation, including the obligation to define such crimes in their national criminal legislation and to take the necessary measures to ensure that their courts are competent to try such crimes.[785] It should be added that the treaties in question establish systems of international cooperation and judicial assistance between States.[786] Second, the Commission also noted that the crimes of apartheid, torture and enforced disappearance are subject under the Rome Statute to a specific threshold that is defined as the commission of such crimes "as part of a widespread or systematic attack directed against any civilian population, with knowledge of the attack",[787] which, however, does not exist in the instruments specifically related to these crimes. Third, the Commission observed that the conventions against torture and enforced disappearance expressly establish that such acts can only be committed by State officials or at their instigation or with their support or acquiescence.[788] In addition, the Commission took into account the fact that, in many cases, when national courts have dealt with these crimes in relation to immunity, they have done so by treating them as separate crimes. The treatment of torture is a good example of this.[789] Some members noted, however, that the inclusion of those crimes in draft article 7 found little if any support in practice, in national and international jurisprudence or in national legislation.

(20) While some members of the Commission suggested that the list should include other crimes such as slavery, terrorism, human trafficking, child prostitution and child pornography, and piracy, which are also the subject of international treaties that establish special legal regimes for each crime for the purposes of prevention, suppression and punishment, the Commission decided not to include them. In doing so, it took into account the fact that these crimes either are already covered by the category of crimes against humanity or do not fully correspond to the definition of crimes under international law stricto sensu, being more correctly described in most cases as transnational crimes. In addition, such crimes are usually committed by non-State actors and are not reflected in national judicial practice relating to immunity from jurisdiction. In any event, the non-inclusion of other international crimes in draft article 7 should not be taken to mean that the Commission underestimates the seriousness of such crimes.

(21) Lastly, it should be noted that the Commission did not include in draft article 7, paragraph 1, the crimes of corruption or crimes affected by the so-called "territorial tort exception" proposed by the Special Rapporteur.[790] This does not mean, however, that the Commission considers that immunity from foreign criminal jurisdiction ratione materiae should apply to these two categories of crimes.

(22) With regard to corruption (understood as "grand corruption"), several members of the Commission pointed out that crimes of corruption are especially serious as they directly affect the interests and stability of the State, the well-being of its population and even its international relations. Consequently, those members were in favour of including an exception to immunity ratione materiae. However, other members of the Commission argued that, while the seriousness of the crime of corruption cannot be called into question, its inclusion in draft article 7 posed a problem, related essentially to the general nature of the term "corruption" and the wide range of acts that can be included in this category, as well as the fact that, in their view, treaty practice and case law do not provide sufficient grounds for including such crimes among the limitations and exceptions to immunity. Other members questioned whether corruption met the test of gravity of the other crimes listed in draft article 7. Lastly, several members of the Commission pointed out that corruption cannot under any circumstances be regarded as an act performed in an official capacity and therefore need not be included among the crimes for which immunity does not apply.

(23) Especially in view of that last argument, the Commission decided not to include crimes of corruption in draft article 7, on the grounds that they do not constitute "acts performed in an official capacity", but are acts carried out by a State official solely for his or her own benefit.[791] Although some members of the Commission pointed out that the involvement of State officials in such acts cannot be ignored, because it is precisely their official status that facilitates and makes possible the crime of corruption, some members of the Commission took the view that the fact that the crime is committed by an official does not change the nature of the act, which remains an act performed for the official's own benefit even if the official uses State facilities that might give the act a semblance of official status. Accordingly, since the normative element contained in draft article 6, paragraph 1, does not apply to the crime of corruption, several members of the Commission took the view that immunity from jurisdiction ratione materiae does not exist in relation to the crime of corruption and therefore the latter does not need to be included in the list of crimes for which immunity does not apply.[792]

(24) The Commission also considered the case of other crimes committed by a foreign official in the territory of the forum State without that State's consent to both the official's presence in its territory and the activity carried out by the official that gave rise to the commission of the crime (territorial exception). This scenario differs in many respects from the crimes under international law included in paragraph 1 of draft article 7 or the crime of corruption. Although the view was expressed that immunity could exist in these circumstances and the exception should not be included in draft article 7 because there was insufficient practice to justify doing so, the Commission decided not to include it in the draft article for other reasons. The Commission considers that certain crimes,[793] such as murder, espionage, sabotage or kidnapping, committed in the territory of a State in the aforementioned circumstances are subject to the principle of territorial sovereignty and do not give rise to immunity from jurisdiction ratione materiae, and therefore there is no need to include them in the list of crimes for which this type of immunity does not apply. This is without prejudice to the immunity from criminal jurisdiction enjoyed under special rules of international law, as set forth in draft article 1, paragraph 2.

(25) Paragraph 2 of draft article 7 establishes a link between paragraph 1 of the article and the annex to the draft articles, entitled "List of treaties referred to in draft article 7, paragraph 2". While the concept of "crimes under international law" and the concepts of "crime of genocide", "crimes against humanity", "war crimes", "crime of apartheid", "torture" and "enforced disappearance" belong to well established categories in contemporary international law, the Commission is mindful that the fact that draft article 7 refers to "crimes" means that the principle of legal certainty characteristic of criminal law must be preserved and tools must be provided to avoid subjectivity in identifying what is meant by each of the aforementioned crimes.

(26) However, the Commission did not consider it necessary to define the crime of genocide, crimes against humanity, war crimes, the crime of apartheid, torture and enforced disappearance, as this is not part of its mandate within the framework of the present draft articles. On the contrary, the Commission found it preferable to simply identify the treaty instruments that define the aforementioned categories, for inclusion in a list that will enable legal practitioners to act with greater certainty in applying draft article 7. The outcome of this exercise is the list contained in the annex to the draft articles.

(27) As indicated in paragraph 2 of draft article 7, the linkage of each crime with the treaties listed in the annex is only for the purposes of draft article 7 on the immunity of State officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction, in order to identify the definitions of the crimes listed in paragraph 1 of the article without assuming or requiring that States must be parties to those instruments.

(28) On the other hand, it should be borne in mind that the listing of certain treaties has no effect on the customary nature of these crimes, as recognized under international law, or on the specific obligations that may arise from those treaties for States parties. Similarly, the inclusion of only some of the treaties that define the crimes in question has no effect on other treaties that define or regulate the same crimes, whose definitions and legal regimes remain intact for States parties in their application of those treaties. In conclusion, the reference to a specific treaty for the definition of each of the crimes listed in paragraph 1 of draft article 7 is included for reasons of convenience and appropriateness and solely for the purposes of draft article 7 and in no way affects the other rules of customary or treaty-based international law that refer to such crimes and that contain legal regimes of general scope for each of them.

(29) The choice of treaties whose articles are included in the annex to provide a definition of the various crimes under international law was based on three fundamental criteria: (a) the desire to avoid possible confusion when several treaties use different language to define the same crime; (b) the selection of treaties that are universal in scope; and (c) the selection of treaties providing the most up-to-date definitions available.

(30) Genocide was defined for the first time in the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide[794] and its definition has remained constant in contemporary international criminal law, notably in the statute of the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia (art. 4),[795] the statute of the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (art. 2)[796] and, in particular, the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, article 6 of which reproduces the definition contained in the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide. For its part, the Commission defined genocide in article 17 of the 1996 draft Code of Crimes against the Peace and Security of Mankind.[797] For the purposes of the present draft articles, the Commission has included in the annex both the Rome Statute (art. 6) and the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the

(31) With regard to crimes against humanity, it should be recalled that some international treaties have identified certain behaviours as "crimes against humanity"[798] and that international courts have ruled on the customary nature of this category of crimes. The statute of the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia (art. 5) and the statute of the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (art. 3) have also defined this crime. The Commission itself defined this category of crimes in the 1996 draft Code of Crimes against the Peace and Security of Mankind (art. 18).[799] However, the Rome Statute was the first instrument to define this category of crimes separately and comprehensively. For this reason, the Commission considered that article 7 of the Rome Statute should be taken as the definition of crimes against humanity for the purposes of the present draft article. This is consistent with the decision taken earlier by the Commission on the draft articles on crimes against humanity, draft article 3 of which reproduces the definition of this category of crimes contained in article 7 of the Rome Statute.[800]

(32) The concept of war crimes has a long tradition that was originally associated with treaties on international humanitarian law. The Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949 for the protection of war victims and the Protocol Additional to the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949, and relating to the Protection of Victims of International Armed Conflicts (Additional Protocol I), define that category of crimes as "grave breaches".[801] War crimes were defined in the statute of the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia (arts. 2 and 3) and the statute of the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (art. 4), as well as by the Commission itself in the 1996 draft Code of Crimes against the Peace and Security of Mankind (art. 20).[802] The latest definition of war crimes is contained in article 8, paragraph 2, of the Rome Statute, which draws on previous experience and refers comprehensively to war crimes committed in both international and internal armed conflicts, as well as to crimes recognized on the basis of treaties and customary law. For the purposes of the present draft article, the Commission decided to retain the definition contained in article 8, paragraph 2, of the Rome Statute, as the most up-to-date version of the definition of this category of crimes. This does not imply, however, that the importance of the Geneva Conventions of 1949 and the Additional Protocol thereto in relation to the definition of war crimes should be overlooked.

(33) The crime of apartheid was defined for the first time in the International Convention on the Suppression and Punishment of the Crime of Apartheid of 30 November 1973, which, although it describes apartheid as a crime against humanity and a crime under international law (art. I), contains a detailed and separate definition of the crime of apartheid (art. II). For this reason, the Commission decided to retain the definition in the 1973 Convention for the purposes of the present draft article.

(34) Torture is defined as a violation of human rights in all the relevant international instruments. Its characterization as prohibited conduct liable to criminal prosecution is found for the first time in the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment of 10 December 1984, which defines it as a separate crime in article 1, paragraph 1. This definition includes, moreover, the significant requirement that an act cannot be characterized as torture unless it is carried out by or at the instigation of or with the consent of public officials, which places this crime squarely within the scope of the present draft articles. A similar definition is contained in the Inter-American Convention to Prevent and Punish Torture (arts. 2 and 3).[803] The Commission considers that, for the purposes of the present draft article, torture is to be understood in accordance with the definition in the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment.

(35) The enforced disappearance of persons was defined for the first time in the Inter-American Convention on Forced Disappearance of Persons, of 9 June 1994 (art. II).[804] The International Convention for the Protection of All Persons from Enforced Disappearance, of 20 December 2006, also defines this crime (art. 2). As in the case of torture, this definition requires that the act be carried out by or at the instigation of or with the consent of public officials, which places this crime squarely within the scope of the present draft articles. The Commission therefore considers that, for the purposes of the present draft article, the definition of enforced disappearance should be understood in accordance with article 2 of the 2006 Convention.

result was a text that broadly resembles the final version of article 17.[23] It was preceded by a strange text box which indicated that it did not represent any agreement, yet there were no competing proposals. Consensus gradually consolidated around the text, as it underwent minor adjustments in the Zutphen draft[24] and the final version adopted by the Preparatory Committee at the conclusion of its work in April 1998.[25]

At the Rome Conference, the Coordinator introduced the debate with a review of the work in the Preparatory Committee:

> Article 15, entitled 'Issues of admissibility', was the result of extensive discussions in the Preparatory Committee on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court concerning the principle of complementarity. In those discussions, virtually all States had indicated the importance which they attached to the inclusion of the principle of complementarity in the Statute—the principle that the primary obligation for the prosecution of crimes falling within the jurisdiction of the Court lay with States themselves. Also, most delegations had been of the view that, when States were unable or unwilling to fulfil that obligation, the Court should have jurisdiction to intervene. The idea was not that the Court should serve as an appellate body or a court of last resort for national legal systems. Where States assumed their obligations, the Court had no role; only where there was a failure due to inability or unwillingness was the Court engaged. Paragraph 1 of the article set out the basic approach, namely that the Court would determine that a case was inadmissible if it was being investigated or prosecuted by a State, or had been investigated and a decision not to proceed had been taken by the State, or the person concerned had already been tried, or the case was not of sufficient gravity. Subparagraphs (a) and (b) contained the exceptions where the Court could declare a case admissible, that is, if the State was unwilling or unable to carry out the investigation or its decision not to prosecute was based on its unwillingness or inability to prosecute. The terms 'unwillingness' and 'inability' were defined in paragraphs 2 and 3 respectively.[26]

The ensuing debate showed the provision to be broadly acceptable.[27] An 'alternative approach' that had been included in the Preparatory Committee draft, whereby the Court would be without jurisdiction 'where the case in question is being investigated or prosecuted, or has been prosecuted, by a State which has jurisdiction over it',[28] received very modest support[29] and was not retained. There were also complaints that the criteria for determining inability were too subjective.[30] Some slight changes by Mexico[31] received support,[32] and were accepted, but the text adopted by the Preparatory Committee

INTERNATIONAL LAW IMMUNITIES AND THE INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL COURT

By Dapo Akande[*]

The tension between the protection of human rights and the demands of state sovereignty is reflected in the debate on whether state officials should be held responsible in external fora for international crimes committed while in office. This debate involves the interplay between two branches of international law. Firstly, there is the well-established law according immunities to the state and its agents from the jurisdiction of other states (state and diplomatic immunities). This law proceeds from notions of sovereign equality and is aimed at ensuring that states do not unduly interfere with other states and their agents.[1] On the other hand, there are those newer principles of international law that are based on humanitarian values and define certain types of conduct as crimes under international law (international criminal law).[2] One of the challenges in this latter area has been to develop international and national mechanisms by which individuals who commit these crimes may be held responsible. Since states often fail to institute domestic prosecution of their own officials and agents alleged to have committed international crimes, renewed attention has been paid to the possibility of subjecting state agents to prosecution in foreign domestic courts or in international courts. For such prosecution in foreign domestic courts to take place, it will usually have to be shown (1) that those courts have jurisdiction over crimes committed abroad by foreigners against foreigners (i.e., universal or quasi-universal jurisdiction), and (2) that such jurisdiction extends to state agents (i.e., that international law immunities are unavailable). Recent years have seen a significant increase in attempts to institute prosecutions for alleged international crimes in the national courts of states other than that where the acts occurred.[3] However, it has not proved easy to establish the two propositions identified above. Indeed, it has become apparent that the views that states possess universal jurisdiction over international crimes committed abroad and that incumbent and former state officials are subject to foreign domestic prosecution for such crimes are by no means universally held.[4]

This article primarily addresses the extent to which international law immunities may be relied on to prevent prosecution by the International Criminal Court (ICC) of state officials. However, the article considers as a preliminary matter whether state officials accused of committing international crimes in their home state are immune from the criminal jurisdiction of other states. Consideration of the position in national jurisdictions is necessary for two reasons. Firstly, despite the creation of the ICC, the majority of prosecutions for international crimes are expected to take place in domestic courts. This is not only because the ICC has not, as yet, achieved universal acceptance,[5] but because of the complementarity provisions of the Rome Statute of the ICC.[6] Under those provisions, the ICC may not exercise jurisdiction in cases in which a state is willing to investigate or prosecute a person or has genuinely done so. Therefore, the jurisdiction of the ICC supplements national jurisdictions. Secondly, because the ICC has no independent powers of arrest, it must depend on states to arrest and surrender suspects. Where those suspects are serving or former state officials present in the territory of another state, they might be entitled under international law to immunity from the jurisdiction of the latter state. In such circumstances, the "host" state must examine whether that immunity prevents it from arresting and surrendering the suspect to the ICC.

Since this article is devoted to examining the application of international immunities in criminal proceedings, it does not specifically address questions of immunity arising in civil proceedings instituted abroad against foreign states and foreign officials accused of human rights violations. Since the famous Filartiga case,[7] a significant amount of such civil litigation has been pursued in the courts of the United States under the Alien Tort Claims Act of 1789 (28 U.S.C. §1350 (2000)) and the Torture Victim Protection Act of 1991 (28 U.S.C. §1350 note (2000)),[8] as well as in the courts of other states.[9] Because the theories that have been proposed by some writers and judges in order to remove the immunity of states and state officials in civil proceedings also apply to criminal proceedings, some of what is said in this article will be relevant to these civil cases.

Part I introduces the different types of immunity available to state officials when abroad by setting out the distinction between immunity ratione personae and immunity ratione materiae. Brief consideration is given to the application of state and diplomatic immunities in foreign domestic prosecutions for international crimes. It is argued that while immunity ratione personae subsists in cases concerning international crimes, developments in international law mean that the reasons for the application of immunity ratione materiae do not hold in prosecutions for international crimes.

Part II examines whether international law immunities may be pleaded before international tribunals. It is argued that despite the fact that immunities are primarily designed for horizontal interstate relationships, there are important reasons of principle and policy for recognizing that international immunities may also be pleaded before international tribunals.

However, whether or not those immunities are available in practice depends on the text of the instrument creating the tribunal and on whether the state of the official is bound by that instrument.

Finally, Part III examines the application of immunities in proceedings initiated by the ICC. This part analyzes the tension between the two provisions of the ICC Statute dealing with immunities (Arts. 27 and 98). It considers whether Article 98(1)—which directs the Court not to proceed with a request for arrest or surrender of a person where such a request would require the requested state to violate the immunities international law accords to that person—may be relied on both by parties to the ICC Statute and by nonparties. Similar consideration is given to Article 98(2) of the ICC Statute, which requires the Court not to request an arrest or surrender where this would compel the requested state to violate an agreement precluding surrender to the Court. Although it may be claimed that even states parties may rely on the provisions of Article 98, it is argued that the better view is that only nonparties may benefit from them because this view alone gives meaningful effect to Article 27 and to the objects and purposes of the Statute.

I. State and Diplomatic Immunities in National Proceedings Concerning International Crimes

It is commonly accepted that state officials are immune in certain circumstances from the jurisdiction of foreign states.[10] These immunities are derived, firstly, from the customary international law of state immunity—which is concerned with preventing states from exercising control over the public acts of other states. Secondly, under customary international law and applicable treaties, diplomatic agents of states are entitled to immunity from the criminal and civil jurisdiction of the foreign state to which they are accredited.[11] While some officials enjoy broad immunity because of their status or office (immunity ratione personae), the immunity of others relates only to acts performed in their official capacity (immunity ratione materiae). This part briefly examines the rationale underpinning the conferment of these immunities, as well as their scope. In particular, it will be considered whether these immunities remain applicable in criminal proceedings alleging that an official or diplomat has committed a crime under international law.[12]

Immunity Ratione Personae (Immunity Attaching to an Office or Status)

The first type of immunity applicable to certain state officials is immunities which attach to a particular office and are possessed only as long as the official is in office ("personal immunity" or "immunity ratione personae"). These immunities are limited to a small group of senior state officials, especially heads of state, heads of government, and foreign ministers.[13] They also apply to diplomats and other officials on special mission in foreign states.[14] These immunities are conferred on officials with primary responsibility for the conduct of the international relations of the state, and stem from the recognition that the smooth conduct of international relations and international cooperation requires an effective process of communication between states.[15] The effectiveness of this process of communication and cooperation in turn requires that the state agents charged with the conduct of international relations be able to travel freely in order to perform their functions without the fear or possibility of harassment by other states.[16] Thus, these immunities are necessary for the maintenance of a system of peaceful cooperation and coexistence among states.[17] As the International Court of Justice (ICJ) has pointed out, there is "no more fundamental prerequisite for the conduct of relations between States . . . than the inviolability of diplomatic envoys and embassies."[18]

Since heads of states, diplomats, and other officials accorded immunity ratione personae will be hindered in the exercise of their functions if they are arrested and detained while in a foreign state, these officials are absolutely immune from the criminal jurisdiction of the foreign state. In the Arrest Warrant case, the ICJ held that this type of immunity applies not only in relation to the official acts of this limited group of senior officials, but also in relation to private acts.[19] For the same reason, the immunity applies whether or not the act in question was done at a time when the official was in office or before entry into office.[20] Consequently, the issuance and circulation of an arrest warrant, not to speak of the actual arrest and prosecution of these senior officials, would constitute a violation of international law.[21] However, because immunity ratione personae is conferred so as to permit free exercise of diplomatic functions, it attaches only for as long as the person is in office.

The ICJ has confirmed that the absolute nature of the immunity from criminal process accorded to a serving foreign minister subsists even when it is alleged that he or she has committed an international crime and applies even when the foreign minister is abroad on a private visit.[22] The Court stated that "[i]t has been unable to deduce . . . that there exists under customary international law any form of exception to the rule according immunity from criminal jurisdiction and inviolability to incumbent Ministers for Foreign Affairs, where they are suspected of having committed war crimes or crimes against humanity."[23]

This principle—which must be taken as applying to all those serving senior state officials and diplomats possessing immunity ratione personae[24]—has been justified on the ground that an absence of immunity in relation to human rights violations committed abroad is likely to hinder international cooperation without significantly increasing protection of human rights.[25] According to this reasoning, the effect of any rule removing immunity will simply be to prevent foreign leaders from traveling abroad.

The principle that immunity ratione personae subsists even when it is alleged that the senior serving official has committed an international crime has been applied in recent years by several national courts.[26] Judicial opinion and state practice[27] on this point are unanimous and no case can be found in which it was held that a state official possessing immunity ratione personae is subject to the criminal jurisdiction of a foreign state when it is alleged that he or she has committed an international crime.[28]

While the existence and scope of immunity ratione personae appears to be reasonably settled, questions remain as to which government officials are entitled to benefit from this absolute immunity from foreign criminal prosecution. In the Arrest Warrant case, the ICJ stated that these immunities are available to "diplomatic and consular agents, [and] certain holders of high-ranking office in a State, such as the Head of State, Head of Government and Minister for Foreign Affairs."[29] While it has long been clear that serving heads of state, heads of government,[30] and diplomats[31] possess absolute immunity ratione personae in criminal cases, the position of foreign ministers has sometimes been controversial.[32] However, in the Arrest Warrant case, the ICJ held—without reference to any supporting state practice—that absolute immunity ratione personae also applies to foreign ministers because they are responsible for the international relations of the state and "[i]n the performance of these functions, he or she is frequently required to travel internationally, and thus must be in a position freely to do so whenever the need should arise."[33]

Although basing this type of immunity on the fact that the official concerned is charged with international functions would conform with the rationale for such immunity, it would considerably extend the range of officials entitled to it. The current state of international affairs requires a very wide range of officials (senior and junior) to travel in the exercise of their functions. Ministers other than those specifically designated with responsibility for foreign affairs often represent their state internationally. They may have to conduct bilateral negotiations with other governments or represent their governments at international summits. Indeed, it is difficult to think of any ministerial position that does not require at least some level of international involvement.[34] In the past, it has not been recognized that the mere fact that an official acts in the conduct of international relations suffices to confer immunity ratione personae. However, where officials represent their states at international organizations, they will usually be accorded immunity by treaty.[35] Furthermore, it may well be that, under customary international law as well as treaty law, the person of any official sent abroad on a special mission by a state is inviolable, with the result that he or she may not be arrested or detained.[36] This rule would be entirely consistent with the policy underlying immunity ratione personae.

Immunity Ratione Materiae (Immunity Attaching to Official Acts)

Even state officials that are not entitled to immunity ratione personae are immune from the jurisdiction of other states in relation to acts performed in their official capacity ("functional immunity" or "immunity ratione materiae").[37] Since this type of immunity attaches to the official act, it may be relied on not only by serving state officials, but also by former officials with respect to official acts performed while in office.[38] It may also be relied on by persons or

I would think it very unlikely that ministerial appointments such as Home Secretary, Employment Minister, Environment Minister, Culture Media and Sports Minister would automatically acquire a label of [S]tate immunity. However, I do believe that the Defence Minister may be a different matter.

However, in modern international affairs, it is difficult to see that the ministers listed above would not be involved in travel on behalf of the state.

For example, Yoram Dinstein, Diplomatic Immunity from Jurisdiction Ratione Materiae, 15 INT'L & COMP. bodies that are not state officials or organs but have acted on behalf of the state.[39] The application of immunity ratione materiae to state officials has occurred more often in civil than criminal cases.[40] However, the reason is not difficult to decipher. The criminal jurisdiction of states is primarily territorial and state officials do not usually exercise their official functions in the territory of other states. Thus, the circumstances in which state officials will be criminally prosecuted in a foreign state for an act done in their official capacity are limited. Nevertheless, the assertion of immunity ratione materiae in criminal cases is not unknown and the reasons for which it is conferred apply a fortiori in criminal cases.[41]

Two related policies underlie the conferral of immunity ratione materiae. Firstly, this type of immunity constitutes a substantive defense in that it indicates that the individual official is not to be held legally responsible for acts that, in effect, are those of the state.[42] Secondly, the immunity of state officials in foreign courts prevents circumvention of the immunity of the state through proceedings brought against those acting on behalf of the state.[43] In this sense, this immunity operates as a jurisdictional or procedural bar and prevents courts from indirectly exercising control over acts of the foreign state through proceedings against the official who carried out the act.

Even though serving or former state officials are generally entitled to immunity ratione materiae in relation to their official acts, such immunity from foreign domestic criminal jurisdiction does not exist when the person is charged with an international crime. There have been a significant number of domestic prosecutions of officials of foreign states for international crimes.[44] Every one of these decisions proceeds—at least implicitly, and sometimes [40] For the suggestion that the paucity of domestic criminal cases recognizing the immunity ratione materiae of state officials makes it difficult to prove that this type of immunity applies in criminal proceedings, see Tomonori, supra note 10, at 262.

[41] The most well-known case in which this type of immunity was asserted with respect to criminal proceedings is McLeod's case. See R. Y. Jennings, The Caroline and McLeod Cases, 32 AJIL 82, 92 (1938). While both the British and U.S. governments accepted that there was immunity under international law from both civil and criminal processes, McLeod was actually subjected to trial owing to the inability of the U.S. federal government to interfere with the prosecution. However, in the Rainbow Warrior case, 74 ILR 241 (arb. 1987), the French government's assertion that military officers should not be tried in New Zealand once France had accepted international responsibility was rejected by New Zealand. See also the few cases cited by Tomonori, supra note 10, at 262.

[42] See CASSESE, INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL LAW, supra note 2, at 266; FOX, supra note 1, at 510–13. In Attorney General of Israel v. Eichmann, 36 ILR 277, 308–09 (Sup. Ct. 1962), the Israeli Supreme Court stated:

> The theory of "Act of State" means that the act performed by a person as an organ of the State—whether he was Head of the State or a responsible official acting on the Government's orders—must be regarded as an act of the State alone. It follows that only the latter bears responsibility therefor, and it also follows that another State has no right to punish the person who committed the act, save with the consent of the State whose mission he performed. Were it not so, the first State would be interfering in the internal affairs of the second, which is contrary to the conception of the equality of States based on their sovereignty.

However, the Court was not prepared to accept that this theory applied in all cases. In Prosecutor v. Blaškić, Objection to Issue of Subpoenae duces tecum, No. IT–95–14–AR 108 bis (Oct. 29, 1997), 110 ILR 609, 707, para. 38, the appeals chamber of the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia (ICTY) stated that > [state] officials are mere instruments of a State and their official action can only be attributed to the State. They cannot be the subject of sanctions or penalties for conduct that is not private but undertaken on behalf of the State. In other words, State officials cannot suffer the consequences of wrongful acts which are not attributable to them personally but to the State on whose behalf they act: they enjoy so-called "functional immunity". This is a well-established rule of customary international law going back to the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, restated many times since.

explicitly[45]—on the basis of a lack of immunity ratione materiae in respect of such crimes. Two principal reasons have been advanced in support of this argument. Firstly, it has been argued that while officials possess immunity ratione materiae in respect of official acts, acts amounting to international crimes are not to be considered as official acts.[46] Secondly, it has been argued that there is no immunity with respect to international crimes because these crimes constitute violations of jus cogens norms and peremptory norms have a higher status than, and ought to prevail over, the rules according immunity.[47] For reasons explored more fully elsewhere,[48] both of these arguments are unpersuasive because they misunderstand the basis upon which state immunity is accorded and suggest a false conflict between the rule according state immunity and the relevant jus cogens norms. In any event, the argument that immunity may not be accorded for acts in violation of jus cogens has been rejected by the International Court of Justice,[49] the European Court of Human Rights,[50] and most national courts to have considered the issue.[51]

While international crimes, when committed by state officials, will often constitute official acts, a separate rule removes immunity ratione materiae in proceedings relating to international crimes. This immunity is not available in such proceedings because the reasons for which such immunity is conferred[52] do not apply to prosecutions for international crimes. Firstly, the general principle that only the state and not the officials may be held responsible for acts done by officials in their official capacity does not apply to acts that amount to international crimes.[53] On the contrary, it is well established that the official position of individuals does not exempt them from individual responsibility for acts that are crimes under international law, and thus does not constitute a substantive defense.[54]

Secondly, to the extent that international law has subsequently developed rules permitting domestic courts to exercise universal jurisdiction over certain international crimes and to the extent that those rules contemplate prosecution of crimes committed in an official capacity, the second reason for immunity ratione materiae disappears. In those circumstances, immunity ratione materiae cannot logically coexist with such a grant of jurisdiction. Indeed, to apply in such cases, the prior rule according immunity would serve to deprive the subsequent jurisdictional rule of practically all meaning. This constitutes the best explanation for the decision of the English House of Lords in the Pinochet case (No. 3). Most of the judges in that case held that since the Torture Convention limited the offense of torture to acts committed in the exercise of official capacity, the granting of immunity ratione materiae would necessarily have been inconsistent with the provisions of the Convention that accord universal jurisdiction over the offense.[55] Accordingly, immunity ratione materiae must be regarded as having been displaced by the rule according universal jurisdiction for acts of torture.

Similarly, since grave breaches of the 1949 Geneva Conventions and other war crimes committed in an international armed conflict are almost by definition acts committed by military and other officials of states, the treaty rules according universal jurisdiction over such crimes cannot logically coexist with the grant of immunity ratione materiae to state officials.[56] However, because genocide, crimes against humanity, and war crimes committed in an internal armed conflict may be committed by nonstate actors, the rules permitting universal jurisdiction with respect to these crimes are not practically coextensive with immunity ratione materiae (which is the case with torture and war crimes committed in an international armed conflict). Nevertheless, it may be argued that these jurisdictional rules contemplate the domestic prosecution of state officials and, for that reason, prevail over the prior rule according immunity ratione materiae.[57] Therefore, immunity ratione materiae does not exist with respect to domestic criminal proceedings for any of the international crimes set out in the Statute of the ICC.

not be pleaded before international tribunals.[58] In the Arrest Warrant case, the ICJ stated that "the immunities enjoyed under international law . . . do not represent a bar to criminal prosecution in certain circumstances. . . . [A]n incumbent or former Minister for Foreign Affairs may be subject to criminal proceedings before certain international criminal courts, where they have jurisdiction."[59]

A similar view was also taken by the Special Court for Sierra Leone (SCSL)[60] in proceedings against the former head of state of Liberia, Charles Taylor.[61] Taylor challenged the validity of his indictment on the basis that it was issued while he was still in office and was therefore contrary to the immunity of a head of state under international law.[62] However, the appeals chamber of the Special Court (agreeing with the Office of the Prosecutor and the amici curiae appointed by the Court) rejected the challenge by Taylor.[63] Relying on the Statutes of the Nuremberg and Tokyo International Military Tribunals, the ad hoc international criminal courts, and the ICC,[64] as well as the Arrest Warrant and Pinochet cases, the SCSL held that "the principle seems now established that the sovereign equality of states does not prevent a Head of State from being prosecuted before an international criminal tribunal or court."[65]

However, the view that international law immunities may never be pleaded in proceedings instituted before international courts and tribunals oversimplifies the matter.[66] Whether or > Strictly speaking, under international law individuals are only entitled to enjoy personal immunities vis-à-vis the authorities of the State where they are authorized to discharge official functions (the 'receiving or territorial State'). Clearly, these immunities cannot be relied upon before the ICC; hence they cannot preclude the exercise of the Court's jurisdiction.

[60] The Special Court for Sierra Leone is an international tribunal created under a treaty between the United Nations and Sierra Leone to prosecute persons that committed serious international crimes during the Sierra Leonean civil war. The agreement establishing the Court and its Statute are available online at <http://www.sc-sl.org>. Unlike the ICTY and the ICTR, the Court was not established by Security Council resolution and cannot bind all UN members. While Security Council Resolution 1315 (Aug. 14, 2000), 40 ILM 248 (2000), encouraged the establishment of the Special Court, it is not the legal basis for its creation. See Report of the Secretary-General on the Establishment of a Special Court for Sierra Leone, UN Doc. On March 7, 2003, the prosecutor issued an indictment charging Charles Taylor (then the head of state of Liberia) with responsibility for crimes against humanity and war crimes committed on the territory of neighboring Sierra Leone during the civil war in that state. In June 2003, the prosecutor sought the arrest of Taylor on the basis of the indictment while Taylor was in Ghana for peace talks with Liberian rebels. not those wanted for prosecution by an international criminal tribunal may rely on international law immunities to exempt themselves from its jurisdiction depends, firstly, on the provisions of the statute establishing that tribunal. While these texts tend to include a general rule to the effect that the official position of a defendant may not be relied on as a bar to prosecution,[67] it is important to pay attention to the manner in which immunity is provided.[68]

Secondly, and more important, the possibility of relying on international law immunities (particularly immunity ratione personae) to avoid prosecutions by international tribunals depends on the nature of the tribunal: how it was established and whether the state of the official sought to be tried is bound by the instrument establishing the tribunal. In this regard, there is a distinction between those tribunals established by United Nations Security Council resolution (i.e., the International Criminal Tribunals for the Former Yugoslavia (ICTY) and Rwanda (ICTR)) and those established by treaty. Because of the universal membership of the United Nations and because decisions of the Council are binding on all UN members,[69] the provisions of the ICTY and ICTR Statutes are capable of removing immunity with respect to practically all states. But this is only because those states are bound by and have indirectly consented (via the UN Charter) to the decision to remove immunity.[70] On the other hand, since only parties to a treaty are bound by its provisions,[71] a treaty establishing an international tribunal cannot remove immunities that international law grants to officials of states that are not party to the treaty. Those immunities are rights belonging to the nonparty states and those states may not be deprived of their rights by a treaty to which they are not party.[72]

It is not an adequate response to assert that those immunities are conferred by international law only with respect to interstate relations and in proceedings before national courts. The immunities are conferred to prevent foreign states from unduly interfering in the affairs of other states and from exercising judicial jurisdiction over another state in circumstances where it has not consented. It makes little difference whether the foreign states seek to exercise this judicial jurisdiction unilaterally or through some collective body that the state concerned has not consented to. To suggest that immunity is nonexistent before an international tribunal that has not been consented to by the relevant state is to allow subversion of the policy underpinning international law immunities. Indeed, the amici curiae to the SCSL recognized this [67] See provisions cited supra note 54.

[68] Because the decision was taken not to prosecute the Japanese emperor after World War II, Article 6 of the Charter of the Tokyo Tribunal (unlike Article 7 of the Nuremberg Tribunal Agreement), both supra note 54, does not explicitly provide that a person's position as head of state may not be relied on as exempting individual responsibility. Also, while Article 27 of the ICC Statute, supra note 6, denies immunity, Article 98 of the Statute preserves it for certain persons.

[69] UN CHARTER Art. 25.

[70] It may be asked whether the Security Council can override the immunities normally accruing to representatives of states that are not members of the United Nations. This question may have been raised in 1999 when the ICTY indicted the then head of state of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (FRY)—Slobodan Milošević—and other senior members of the FRY government. At the time of the indictment, there was some doubt as to whether the FRY was a member of the United Nations. To the extent that the FRY was not a UN member, an attempt by other states to execute the indictment and arrest warrant would arguably have engaged the legal responsibility of the arresting state and/or even that of the United Nations. By the time Milošević was handed over to the ICTY in June 2001, the FRY had been admitted to the United Nations (in 2000). In any event, surrender by the FRY would have constituted a waiver of any available immunities. point in stating: "If the Special Court had not been established pursuant to Security Council resolution the situation may be materially different: for example, two States may not . . . establish an international criminal court for the purpose, or with the effect, of circumventing the jurisdictional limitations incumbent on national courts . . . ."[73] It is difficult to understand how the amici curiae, having admitted this much, could have reached the conclusion that a serving head of state cannot claim immunity before an international tribunal[74]—a conclusion expressly stated to apply whether or not it was established under Chapter VII of the UN Charter.

Finally, the ICTY has recognized, in Prosecutor v. Blaškić,[75] that there are circumstances in which international immunities may be pleaded before an international tribunal. In that case, the appeals chamber held that because state officials are entitled to functional immunity (immunity ratione materiae) with respect to official acts, the Tribunal was not entitled to issue an order requiring them to produce documents they held in their official capacity. While the appeals chamber acknowledged that the rule according immunity ratione materiae was based on sovereign equality and "undoubtedly applies to relations between States inter se," it held that the rule "must also be taken into account, and indeed it has always been respected, by international organizations as well as international courts."[76] In Prosecutor v. Krstić, the appeals chamber appeared to contradict its earlier decision in Blaškić when it stated that "[i]t may be the case (it is unnecessary to decide here) that, between States, such a functional immunity exists against prosecution for those acts [attributable to the state], but it would be incorrect to suggest that such an immunity exists in international criminal courts."[77] However, the statement in Krstić relates to immunity ratione materiae and probably amounts to nothing more than a decision that such immunity does not extend to prosecutions for international crimes. Indeed, the Krstić appeals chamber did not question the general principle that functional immunities available to state officials restrict the power of the international tribunal to issue orders to state officials. It only questioned the scope of that immunity.[78]

In sum, the statement by the ICJ that international immunities may not be pleaded before certain international tribunals must be read subject to the condition (1) that the instruments creating those tribunals expressly or implicitly remove the relevant immunity,[79] and (2) that the state of the official concerned is bound by the instrument removing the immunity. Therefore, a senior serving state official entitled to immunity ratione personae (for example, a head of state) is entitled to such immunity before an international tribunal that the state concerned has not consented to.

International criminal courts are established by States acting together, whether directly or indirectly as in the case of the Tribunal, which was established by the Security Council on behalf of States members of the United Nations. There is no basis for suggesting that by merely acting together to establish such a court States signify an intention to waive their individual functional immunities. A presumption of continuance of their immunities as these exist under international law is only offset where some element in the decision to establish such a court shows that they agreed otherwise.

III. THE ICC STATUTE AND IMMUNITY

This part of the article considers the application of immunities in proceedings initiated by the ICC. The first section highlights the tension between the two provisions in the ICC Statute dealing with immunities (Arts. 27 and 98). In the next section, detailed attention is given to whether states parties, nonparties, and international organizations may benefit from the provisions of paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 98. Those provisions direct the Court not to request the arrest or surrender of a person where such a request would require the requested state to violate either the immunities that international law accords to that person or an international agreement precluding surrender to the Court. Finally, the third section considers whether it is the ICC or national authorities that are competent to decide on whether a person wanted by the Court is entitled to immunity from arrest and surrender.

The Tension Between Articles 27 and 98 of the ICC Statute

As indicated in part II above, the determination whether state, diplomatic, or other immunities are available in relation to the ICC must begin by examining the text of the ICC Statute. Two provisions of the ICC Statute bear on questions of immunity: Articles 27 and 98. Article 27 primarily addresses the position of state officials in relation to the ICC itself. Article 27(1) provides:

> This Statute shall apply equally to all persons without any distinction based on official capacity. In particular, official capacity as a Head of State or Government, a member of a Government or parliament, an elected representative or a government official shall in no case exempt a person from criminal responsibility under this Statute, nor shall it, in and of itself, constitute a ground for reduction of sentence.

This provision has now become standard in the founding instruments of international criminal tribunals. Similar provisions were inserted into the relevant agreements for the Nuremberg and Tokyo Tribunals after World War II, as well as the Statutes of the ICTY and the ICTR.[80] Article 27(1) primarily addresses the substantive responsibility of state officials for international crimes rather than questions of immunity. Its main effect is to establish that the official capacity of a person does not relieve him of individual criminal responsibility and it eliminates a substantive defense that may be put forward by state officials.[81]

It may be argued that Article 27(1) and similar provisions do not deal with immunity at all since a statement that a person may be legally responsible does not address whether that person is subject to the jurisdiction of a particular forum, that is, whether that forum may determine that responsibility. Those jurisdictional issues are addressed, in part, by the law on international immunities, and the possession of immunity does not mean that the person concerned may not be legally responsible for the act in question.

However, deeper analysis shows that Article 27(1) does have the effect of removing at least some of the immunities to which state officials would otherwise be entitled.[82] First of all, questions of legal responsibility are not wholly separate from questions of immunity. As has already been argued, one of the reasons for conferring immunity with respect to official acts is that they are generally regarded as acts of states for which the state and not the official ought to be held responsible.[83] To the extent that an international rule establishes that the official himself ought to be held responsible for the act, that reason for immunity disappears. Secondly, by providing that the ICC Statute applies to state officials, Article 27(1) establishes that those officials are subject to prosecution by the ICC even when they acted in their official capacity. Therefore, Article 27(1) is also jurisdictional in nature. Not only does the second sentence implicitly exclude immunities based on the official nature of the act; the first sentence also implicitly establishes that the official status of defendants does not exclude them from the jurisdiction of the ICC.

Perhaps as a result of doubts as to whether Article 27(1) completely removes the possibility of reliance on immunities in proceedings before the ICC, Article 27(2) contains an explicit denial of international and national law immunities. It provides: "Immunities or special procedural rules which may attach to the official capacity of a person, whether under national or international law, shall not bar the Court from exercising its jurisdiction over such a person." This provision is new. It has no counterpart in the Nuremberg or Tokyo Tribunal agreements or in the ICTY and ICTR Statutes. Article 27(2) conclusively establishes that state officials are subject to prosecution by the ICC and that provision constitutes a waiver by states parties of any immunity that their officials would otherwise possess vis-à-vis the ICC.

However, the removal of immunity vis-à-vis the ICC by Article 27 is not the end of the matter. Because the Court does not have independent powers of arrest and must rely on states to arrest and surrender wanted persons,[84] the immunities of state officials in national jurisdictions become important. To the extent that the Court is seeking arrest and surrender from the state of the official concerned, Article 27 constitutes a waiver of national law immunities by parties to the Statute. States parties are therefore obliged to arrest and surrender their own officials even if those officials would otherwise be entitled to immunity under national law.[85] However, where an official is outside his or her state and is entitled under international law to immunity from arrest and criminal process in the other state, the matter is more complicated. To deal with this issue, Article 98(1) of the ICC Statute provides:

> The Court may not proceed with a request for surrender or assistance which would require the requested State to act inconsistently with its obligations under international law with respect to the State or diplomatic immunity of a person or property of a third State, unless the Court can first obtain the cooperation of that third State for the waiver of the immunity.[86]

Thus, while Article 27 provides that a state official's possession of international immunity shall not bar the ICC from exercising jurisdiction, Article 98 directs the Court not to take action that would result in the violation by states of their international obligations to accord immunity to foreign officials.[87]

Most likely, the primary way the Court will gain custody of indicted state officials is through the cooperation of other states parties on whose territory the officials happen to be. After all, nonparties to the ICC Statute have no obligation to surrender their nationals or officials to [83] See text supra at note 42.

Jan. 22, 1999) (Fr.).

[86] In addition, Article 98(2) of the ICC Statute, supra note 6, provides:

> The Court may not proceed with a request for surrender which would require the requested State to act inconsistently with its obligations under international agreements pursuant to which the consent of a sending State is required to surrender a person of that State to the Court, unless the Court can first obtain the cooperation of the sending State for the giving of consent for the surrender.

the ICC, and parties may breach their obligations by refusing to hand over their own officials.[88] However, the Court's ability to gain custody of state officials and the denial of immunity provided for in Article 27 may be undermined by the fact that officials may be entitled to rely on international immunities in order to prevent other states from arresting them. Whether or not this proves to be a significant barrier to the exercise of the ICC's jurisdiction will depend on the interpretation given to Article 98(1).

Who May Benefit from Article 98?

The position of officials and diplomats of states not party to the ICC Statute. Although the ICC is entitled to exercise jurisdiction over nationals of states not party to its Statute,[89] nothing in the ICC Statute can operate to remove the immunities that officials of nonparties would ordinarily possess under international law.[90] Part 9 of the Statute imposes an obligation on parties to cooperate with requests from the ICC for the arrest and surrender of persons on their territory. However, states parties would breach their international obligations to nonparties if they arrested and surrendered to the ICC an official of a nonparty who is entitled to immunity from arrest and prosecution.[91] In these circumstances, Article 98(1), by directing the Court not to proceed with a request for arrest, ensures that ICC parties will not be placed in the position of facing competing legal obligations to the ICC and other states. Indeed, since the ICC operates in effect by "delegation" from (or in the place of) its states parties,[92] the immunity of officials of nonparties applies not only in relation to states parties, but also in relation to the ICC itself. Thus, the Court itself is prevented by international law from taking steps that would amount to a violation of those immunities.[93] In particular, the ICC would be prevented from even issuing an arrest warrant under Article 58 of the Statute.[94] This follows from the decision of the ICJ in the Arrest Warrant case,[95] which held that the issuance and circulation of an arrest

[88] The risk of this happening is quite high, since the principle of complementarity adopted in the ICC Statute means that the ICC will exercise its jurisdiction only when the national state has genuinely failed to exercise its own jurisdiction in the case. See id. at 143–44.

[89] ICC Statute, supra note 6, Art. 12(2)(a) (providing for ICC jurisdiction with respect to crimes committed on the territory of an ICC party). [94] The arrest warrant issued under Article 58(1) by the ICC's pretrial chamber after the conclusion of investigations by the prosecutor appears to be preliminary to, and different from, the request for arrest to which Article 98(1) relates. The latter is provided for in Part 9 of the ICC Statute (specifically Articles 89–92). That there is a difference is implicit in the requirement that a request for arrest under Article 91 must be supported by a copy of the arrest warrant.

[95] Arrest Warrant, supra note 4, paras. 70–71. Some of the dissenting judges in this case (Judge Oda and Judge ad hoc Van den Wyngaert, paras. 13 & 78–80, respectively, of their dissenting opinions) have argued that the mere issuance or international circulation of an arrest warrant is not a violation of applicable immunities because the receiving state is not obligated to carry it out. See also Submissions of the Amicus Curiae on Head of State Immunity, note 65 supra. This argument is unconvincing because the mere issuance and circulation of the warrant is sufficient, and likely to restrict the ability of the relevant serving senior state officials (such as heads of state, heads of government, and foreign ministers) to travel and carry out their international functions. The very purpose of immunity ratione personae is to permit the senior serving state officials to carry out their international functions.

warrant for a person entitled to immunity violates that immunity even where no subsequent steps are taken.[96]

The position of officials and diplomats of parties to the ICC Statute under Article 98(1). Although it is clear that Article 98(1) applies to immunities enjoyed by officials of nonparties, it is less clear whether that provision also refers to immunities ordinarily enjoyed by officials of ICC parties. The question is whether Article 98(1) prevents the Court from requesting that one state party surrender the official of another state party present on the territory of the first, where the official would normally have immunity under international law. The answer depends on the relationship between Articles 27 and 98. In particular, the answer depends on whether the waiver of immunity contained in the former provision is a waiver not only in relation to the ICC, but in relation to the exercise of authority by other parties where those other parties are acting in support of the exercise of ICC jurisdiction. The view that Article 98(1) applies only to officials of nonparties has been taken by scholars[97] and by some ICC parties.[98] This view is reflected in the legislation of a number of ICC parties implementing their obligations under the ICC Statute. For example, under section 23(1) of the United Kingdom's International Criminal Court Act of 2001, "[a]ny state or diplomatic immunity attaching to a person by reason of a connection with a state party to the ICC Statute" does not prevent his or her arrest in Britain or surrender to the Court. However, where the state or diplomatic immunity attaches by reason of a connection to a nonstate party, section 23(2) in effect provides that proceedings for arrest or surrender may continue only where the nonstate party has waived immunity. Virtually identical provisions and language are used in the relevant legislation of Malta and Ireland.[99] The relevant legislation of Canada and New Zealand goes even further and appears to provide that no person may rely on international law immunities in proceedings instituted pursuant to an ICC request for arrest and surrender.[100] Nevertheless, in the light of the discussion in the previous section, the Canadian and New Zealand provisions should not be interpreted as applying to officials of states not party to the ICC Statute.[101]

[96] Arguably, the position of diplomatic and consular officials is different since international law accords immunities to these officials only in the state to which they are accredited or through which they transit. VCDR, supra note 11, Arts. 39, 40; VCCR, supra note 38, Arts. 53, 54. Other states have no obligation to refrain from arresting such persons, and the issuance and circulation of an arrest warrant to other states will not violate immunities accorded by international law.

[98] In the margins of the July–August 1999 session of the ICC Preparatory Commission, delegates from Canada and the United Kingdom circulated a paper, quoted in BROOMHALL, supra note 85, at 144, in which they stated:

> The interpretation which should be given to Article 98 is as follows. Having regard to the terms of the Statute, the Court shall not be required to obtain a waiver of immunity with respect to the surrender by one State Party of a head of State or government, or diplomat, of another State Party.

This informal paper [hereinafter UK/Canada paper] was circulated after discussions among the "like-minded" group of countries on the relationship between Articles 27 and 98.

The effect of the provisions referred to in the previous paragraph is that a serving head of state of an ICC party who is on an official visit to the state concerned, or a serving diplomat of an ICC party accredited to that state, may be arrested and surrendered to the Court if the ICC so requests.[102] The immunities ratione personae that ordinarily apply to such persons[103] would therefore not apply. Because this is a far-reaching conclusion that constitutes a significant change from the preexisting legal position, it is imperative that it be supported by convincing and compelling reasoning.

The cases in which the ICC will wish to direct a request for surrender of the official of one state party to another state party are likely to be those in which the official's own state, probably in breach of its obligations, has refused to surrender the accused.[104] Absent voluntary appearance and surrender by a nonstate entity, surrender of the official by another state will offer the only realistic possibility of securing custody. It has therefore been argued that the effectiveness of the Statute is best served by an interpretation that permits the Court to direct its requests for the surrender of officials of states parties to other states.[105] However, because any interference with the immunity that international law accords to serving senior state officials and diplomats constitutes an extremely serious interference into the state concerned and its international relations, the fact that a denial of immunity may be desirable to make the ICC more efficacious is not a sufficient reason to imply such a waiver of immunity. On the contrary, it must be shown that such a removal of otherwise applicable immunity is either stated expressly in the Statute or must necessarily be implied from its provisions.

On one view, the text of Article 98(1) itself resolves the question whether it extends to officials of states parties since it refers to the "immunity of a person . . . of a third State" (emphasis added). According to this view, the expression "third state," when used in the law of treaties, usually refers to states not party to the relevant treaty,[106] and therefore refers in Article 98(1) to states that are not party to the ICC Statute. However, this argument is neither compelling nor decisive. The fact that Article 98(1) speaks of "third states" does not necessarily mean that it excludes states parties. More likely, "third state" in that provision is not used to refer to nonparties but, rather, to a state other than the one with custody of the suspect. As Paola Gaeta has noted, in other parts of the Statute where reference is made to states not party to the Statute, it is not the term "third state" that is used but terms such as "non-contracting states" and "states not parties."[107] Significantly, the other uses of the term "third state" in the ICC Statute probably do not refer only to nonparties. For example, it is unlikely that the prohibition under Article 108 of extradition to a third state by states that have custody of persons sentenced by the ICC was meant to cover only nonparties. Likewise, when the Statute uses the term "third party" in connection with requests by the ICC to states parties to provide documents or information disclosed in confidence by a third party, that term explicitly includes states parties as well as nonparties.[108]

A more compelling argument in support of the view that Article 98(1) benefits only nonparties is that an interpretation that allows officials of states parties to rely on international law immunities when they are in other states would deprive the Statute of its stated purpose of preventing impunity and ensuring that the most serious crimes of international concern do not go unpunished.[109] Furthermore, the removal of immunity from the exercise of the Court's jurisdiction contained in Article 27 would be nullified in practice if Article 98(1) were interpreted as allowing parties to rely on the same immunities in order to prevent the surrender of their officials to the Court by other states.[110] This argument is supported by the principle that "[a]n interpreter is not free to adopt a reading that would result in reducing whole clauses or paragraphs of a treaty to redundancy or inutility."[111] Thus, the removal of immunity in Article 27 must be understood as applying not only in relation to the ICC itself, but also in relation to states acting at the request of the ICC. This argument is supported by the fact that, as discussed above, the removal is contained not only in Article 27(2)—which stipulates that immunities are not to bar the ICC from exercising jurisdiction—but also in Article 27(1). Steffen Wirth has pointed out that when the parties agreed in the first sentence of Article 27(1) that the Statute applies to their officials, they thereby agreed that all parts of the Statute, including the cooperation regime in Part 9, apply to those officials.[112] Since the international law immunities of officials of states parties are removed by the Statute, another state on whose territory such an official is present would not be acting "inconsistently with its obligations under international law"[113] by arresting and surrendering that official to the ICC.

[102] Under Article 26S(4) of the Maltese Act and §23(4) of the UK Act (but not under the Irish bill), supra note 99, the minister or secretary of state may, after consultations with the ICC and the other state, direct that proceedings which, but for subsections (1) & (2), would be prohibited by state or diplomatic immunity, shall not be taken.

In response to the arguments just set out, it may be maintained that an interpretation of Article 98(1) that extends its application to officials of ICC parties does not deprive Article 27 of all meaning. Even under such an interpretation of Article 98, Article 27 would allow the ICC to conduct an investigation and even issue an arrest warrant under Article 58 for persons who would otherwise be immune.[114] Furthermore, Article 27 would bar any reliance on immunity once the ICC has taken an accused person connected with a state party into custody.[115] On this view, Article 27 is directed solely at the position of state officials vis-à-vis the Court and does not affect the immunity of those officials from the jurisdiction of other states. Rather than having been waived by Article 27, those immunities, according to this view, are expressly preserved by Article 98(1). Thus, Article 98(1) would prevent the Court from requesting that a host state arrest and surrender an official of another state entitled to international law immunities. However, the Court would remain free to request the surrender of the official from his home state, which is obliged under Part 9 of the ICC Statute to cooperate with the Court in executing the request.

While interpreting Article 98(1) as also applying to officials of parties to the Statute does not totally negate the effect of Article 27, this interpretation leaves only a very small scope of application for Article 27(2). Firstly, it is incorrect to assert that the waiver of international law immunities in Article 27(2) at least allows the Court to conduct an investigation and issue arrest warrants for officials of ICC parties in circumstances where it would otherwise have been unable to do so. If Article 98(1) were interpreted as preventing the Court from requesting that host states arrest those officials of other ICC parties that possess immunity under international law, then the warrants issued under Article 58 could be directed only at the official's home state. Such an interpretation would render that part of Article 27(2) that removes the immunity of officials under international law redundant. Since officials do not possess immunities under international law with respect to their home state, the removal in Article 27(2) of "immunities or special procedural rules which may attach . . . under . . . international law" could not have been for the purpose of allowing the ICC to issue arrest warrants that operate only in relation to the official's home state.

Secondly, the view that Article 27 operates solely in relation to the ICC and removes immunity only when the Court has custody of accused persons (but not when they are still within the territory of a state other than their own) will mean in practice that the provision will rarely apply. In the vast majority of cases, the Court is expected to obtain custody of accused officials through surrender by either their own state or another state. Where an official in the Court's custody has been surrendered by his own state, reliance on Article 27 to remove immunity from the exercise of ICC jurisdiction is hardly necessary, as the surrender itself constitutes a waiver. If Article 98(1) is interpreted as allowing states parties to rely on immunities to prevent the surrender of their officials to the ICC by other states, it would mean that the removal of immunity contained in Article 27 is effectively applicable only in the minority of cases in which custody is secured through the acts of nonstate entities[116] or voluntary appearance.[117] To confine what on its face appears to be an important provision to these limited and exceptional circumstances would appear to defeat the objects and purposes of the Statute.

To give meaningful effect to Article 27, Article 98(1) must be interpreted as applying only to officials of nonparties. Thus, Article 98(1) does not prevent the Court from requesting the surrender of officials of parties even where those officials would otherwise be protected by international law immunities from arrest by national authorities of other states. Correspondingly, parties to the ICC Statute have an obligation under Part 9 to comply with the Court's requests for arrest and surrender where an official of another state party is on their territory. The ICC Statute therefore gives parties the power (or more accurately the obligation) to arrest and surrender senior officials, including a serving head of state or a serving head of diplomatic mission, when—and only when—such persons have been indicted by the ICC and it has issued a warrant for their arrest.

The practice of several parties subsequent to their ratification of the ICC Statute supports the view that Article 27 operates to remove the immunity of officials of states parties in the territory of other states that are acting at the Court's request. Reference has already been made to the implementing legislation of Canada, Ireland, Malta, New Zealand, and the United Kingdom, all of which incorporate Article 27 of the Statute and explicitly deny immunity to officials of states parties in domestic proceedings relating to a request for arrest and surrender by the ICC.[118] Moreover, the provisions in the South African and Swiss legislation appear to take the same view of Article 27.[119] Although this subsequent practice in the application of [116] It cannot be excluded that private parties, or peacekeeping or peace enforcement forces operating under a mandate from an international organization will be involved in surrendering persons to the ICC. Some persons have been transferred to the ICTY by NATO forces operating in Bosnia and Croatia. In one case there appeared to be collusion between private parties and the NATO force. See Prosecutor v. Nikolić, Interlocutory Appeals Decision, No. IT–94–2–AR73 (June 5, 2003). Since peacekeeping or peace enforcement forces are composed of state forces, any limitations that apply to states (e.g., the immunities retained in Article 98) would arguably apply to such forces as well.

the Statute involves only a minority of parties and does not "establish[] the agreement of the parties regarding its interpretation,"[120] it certainly supports the view that Article 98(1) does not prevent the Court from requesting the arrest of officials (even senior serving officials) of states parties.

Conferral of the power to arrest a visiting head of state or serving ambassador is practically unprecedented (though not unknown)[121] in international relations and may lead to significant tensions and disruptions in those relations if that power is not exercised judiciously. It is not certain that the drafters of the relevant parts of the ICC Statute consciously contemplated (at the time of drafting) the possibility that states would be empowered to arrest a serving head of state or ambassador.[122] Nevertheless, as demonstrated above, this power follows from the text of the Statute. In addition, the objects and purposes of the Statute as expressed in the preamble and Article 27 make clear that the drafters did intend that even the most senior state officials of ICC parties should not be excluded from the Court's jurisdiction. Likewise, the drafters took the view that international law immunities ought not to stand in the way of the exercise of such jurisdiction by the Court. While tensions will doubtless arise from the arrest by one state of the head of state or diplomats of another state, the fact that such arrests cannot be unilaterally initiated by the host state but must follow an investigation and a request from the ICC, and the fact that the state of the head of state or diplomat must be an ICC party, ought to reduce these tensions to some degree.

The position of parties and nonparties under Article 98(2). If Article 98(1) applies only to officials of nonparties, the question arises as to whether the same holds true for Article 98(2). Under that provision, > [t]he Court may not proceed with a request for surrender which would require the requested State to act inconsistently with its obligations under international agreements pursuant to which the consent of a sending State is required to surrender a person of that State to the Court, unless the Court can first obtain the cooperation of the sending State for the giving of consent for the surrender.

Like the first paragraph of Article 98, the second paragraph is designed to avoid a situation in which a state, to which a request for surrender or arrest is directed by the Court, is subjected to conflicting obligations. Article 98(2) allows states to honor treaty obligations prohibiting the surrender of persons sent to their territory by other states.[123] In particular, this paragraph allows states to respect the provisions of status of forces agreements (SOFAs), which prohibit states, on whose territory armed forces of another state are located, from arresting troops and related personnel of the sending state.[124] That provision would also cover extradition an elected representative or a government official" does not constitute a ground for refusing to issue an order for surrender to the ICC). The latter provision arguably refers only to domestic and not foreign officials, but since §4(2) states that the official position of these persons shall not constitute a defense despite any other law to the contrary, "including customary and conventional international law," it suggests that foreign officials are contemplated as well.

agreements providing that a person who has been extradited from one state to another may not be re-extradited to a third state without the consent of the first state.[125]

But can an ICC party rely on the agreements covered by Article 98(2) to prevent other states from surrendering personnel of the ICC party to the ICC? This question is of practical importance because a fair number of ICC parties have concluded agreements with other states (mainly the United States) specifically stating that neither party may transfer persons of one party, present in the territory of the other, to the ICC without the consent of the first party. It is worth noting that these agreements with the United States, as currently worded, are not limited to persons sent by one party to the agreement to the other party.[126] Since Article 98(2) only covers agreements requiring the consent of the "sending state" for surrender to the ICC, the U.S. agreements (to the extent that they apply to persons who have not been "sent") are not covered by that provision.[127] Therefore, the Court is not obliged to refrain from requesting the arrest of persons who have not been sent, even though the ICC party is bound by the agreement with the United States not to surrender the person.

In considering whether ICC parties may rely on agreements covered by Article 98(2) to bar a request for surrender by the Court, it is significant that not only have some ICC parties been willing to conclude these agreements with the United States,[128] but the provisions of the agreements are reciprocal so that they also benefit persons of the ICC party. In addition, at least one such agreement was concluded for the benefit of a number of ICC parties with a state other than the United States. Under the Military Technical Agreement between the International Security Assistance Force (ISAF) and the Interim Administration of Afghanistan, Afghanistan agreed not to surrender ISAF personnel to any international tribunal without the express consent of the contributing nation.[129] At the time the Military Technical Agreement was signed, most of the ISAF troop-contributing states were ICC parties, and this remained the case thereafter.[130] The only conclusion that can be drawn from these agreements is that at least some ICC parties take the view that ICC parties may rely on agreements covered by Article 98(2).[131] Some observers have even argued that only agreements benefiting ICC parties are protected by that provision.[132] For reasons discussed earlier,[133] the view that agreements for the benefit of nonparties are not covered by Article 98(2) cannot be accepted. The ICC Statute cannot be taken as overriding the rights of nonparties.

At least three reasons demonstrate the importance of construing Article 98(2)—like Article 98(1)—as benefiting only nonparties. Firstly, the reasons described above for so construing Article 98(1) also apply to agreements covered by Article 98(2),[134] which confer immunity based on official capacity (e.g., SOFAs).[135] Secondly, the significant degree of overlap in the two provisions suggests that they must be given similar interpretations. The overlap arises because treaties conferring state or diplomatic immunities clearly fall within the language of Article 98(2). Whatever the intent of the drafters of the ICC Statute, it cannot be doubted that the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations of 1961 and the UN Convention on Special Missions of 1969 are "international agreements pursuant to which the consent of a sending State is required to surrender a person of that State to the Court."[136] Thus, if Article 98(2) is not limited to nonparties, the limitation of Article 98(1) to nonparties would easily be avoided by relying on Article 98(2) instead. Thirdly, interpreting Article 98(2) as extending to ICC parties while Article 98(1) does not would lead to the manifestly absurd result that troops of parties and extradited persons may not be surrendered to the ICC (because of the SOFAs and extradition agreements covered by Article 98(2)) but that a serving head of state, head of government, or foreign minister who goes to visit those troops in the same country (or the head of the diplomatic mission) has no immunity and may be surrendered to the ICC. Thus, an interpretation of Article 98(2) in context, that is, in the light of the interpretation

For a more recent list, see International Assistance Security Force, at <http://www.afnorth.nato.int/ISAF/index.htm> (last modified Apr. 20, 2004).

[131] This is evidently not the view of the members of the EU. Council of the European Union, supra note 127, annex, at 241 (stating: "Nationality of persons not to be surrendered: any solution should only cover persons who are not nationals of an ICC State Party.").

[132] See EC Commission Legal Service, Effective Functioning of the International Criminal Court Undermined by Bilateral Agreements as Proposed by the U.S., 23 HUM. RTS. L.J. 158–59 (2002) (internal opinion); Human Rights Watch, United States Efforts to Undermine the International Criminal Court: Legal Analysis of Impunity Agreements (Sept. 4, 2002), at <http://www.hrw.org/campaigns/icc/docs/art98analysis.htm>. Those taking this view argue that to interpret Article 98(2) as extending to agreements with nonparties would result in impunity in cases where the nonparty decides not to prosecute. They then argue that such an interpretation must be rejected since one of the purposes of the Statute is the prevention of impunity. According to this view, Article 98(2) is only a "routing device," allowing the ICC party on whose territory a national of another ICC party is found to comply with its treaty obligations to the latter ICC party but leaving the Court free to request surrender from the latter state.

[133] See pp. 421–22 supra. See also Akande, supra note 70, at 643, for further reasons suggesting this argument is unacceptable.

[134] Admittedly, it is more difficult to interpret the wording of Article 98(2) as applying only to agreements concluded by nonparties. Since that provision prevents requests for surrender that would "require the requested State to act inconsistently with its obligations under international agreements pursuant to which the consent of a sending State is required," it does not explicitly exclude agreements concluded by parties. In addition, while obligations under the Statute (such as those in Article 27) are part of the "obligations under international law" of states parties and can therefore be taken into account under Article 98(1), it may be argued that Article 98(2) only requires consideration of the obligations under other international agreements and not under the Statute. Although, as between the same parties, the obligations under the Statute would normally prevail over those in prior agreements, see VCLT, supra note 71, Art. 30(3), it could be argued that Article 98(2) effectively specifies that the Statute is subject to the agreements referred to in that provision. In such circumstances, the provision of that other agreement would prevail, see id., Art. 30(2).

[135] While extradition agreements within the scope of Article 98(2), see supra note 125 and corresponding text, will not be covered by the waiver in Article 27, it has been argued that the right of ICC parties, under those extradition treaties, to demand that persons they extradite not be transferred to the Court has been waived by Article 89 of the ICC Statute. See Wirth, supra note 97, at 455.

given to 98(1), must lead to the conclusion that only agreements for the benefit of nonparties to the ICC Statute come within the scope of Article 98(2).

In concluding this examination of Article 98(2), it should be noted that agreements requiring the consent of a state for the surrender of a person to the ICC that do not come within the scope of that provision (for example, the U.S. agreements or other agreements intended to benefit ICC parties) may nevertheless be legally effective in preventing such transfers to the ICC. This effect may ensue where the agreement was concluded after the entry into force of the ICC Statute. As an ordinary treaty with no "constitutional" status, the ICC Statute does not prevail over subsequent treaties. Clearly, the obligation to confer immunity under preexisting agreements between ICC parties is superseded by the provisions of the ICC Statute.[137] However, obligations under agreements between ICC parties entered into after the Statute came into force will, as between the parties to that later agreement, prevail over their obligations under the ICC Statute.[138] Likewise, obligations under agreements with a nonparty that are not covered by Article 98(2) (such as the U.S. agreements) are valid and binding under international law;[139] but these obligations do not detract from those which ICC parties continue to have, under the ICC Statute, to the other ICC parties not party to the later agreement, and to the ICC. Thus, an ICC party that has entered into a relevant agreement not covered by Article 98(2) and has received a request by the ICC to surrender a person covered by that subsequent agreement will have to contend with inconsistent obligations. If the ICC party chooses to surrender a person covered by such an agreement, it will breach valid treaty obligations and be legally responsible to the other party for that breach.

Officials of international organizations. A further question that may arise in connection with requests by the Court to states for the surrender of persons is whether such requests may be issued when the person wanted is an official of (or an expert on mission for) an international organization. While most international officials possess immunity only with respect to acts performed in their official capacity,[140] an official could conceivably be accused of committing an international crime in the exercise of his official duties.[141] For example, it might be alleged that such a crime was committed during the planning or implementation of a peacekeeping or other military operation conducted or authorized by the international organization.[142] Furthermore, the immunity of the most senior officials of international organizations, such as the UN secretary- general and assistant secretaries-general, is analogous to that of diplomats since those senior officials are generally immune from the jurisdiction of states for as long as they hold office.[143] Therefore, they may not be arrested while in office in relation to any acts, whether committed before or during that period. Similarly, under the UN Immunities Convention, experts on mission are immune from arrest or detention.[144] In all these cases, states are bound to refrain from arresting and surrendering officials or experts of international organizations, even if they are accused of having committed international crimes.

[139] Id., Art. 30(4)(b).

[140] See, e.g., UN Immunities Convention, supra note 35, Art. V, §18(a). A range of treaties deal with the immunities of international organizations. However, the provisions in those treaties dealing with immunity from arrest and criminal process tend to be uniform.

[141] See part I above for the argument that acts which amount to international crimes are nevertheless to be regarded as official acts where they are done under "color of law."

[142] See HENRY G. SCHERMERS & NIELS M. BLOKKER, INTERNATIONAL INSTITUTIONAL LAW 358, §534 (3d rev. ed. 1995); Paul C. Szasz & Thordis Ingadottir, The UN and the ICC: The Immunity of the UN and Its Officials, 14 LEIDEN J. INT'L L. 867, 880 (2001).

[143] See, e.g., UN Immunities Convention, supra note 35, Art. V, §19. Since many heads of international organizations were previously senior state officials or government members, it is not inconceivable that they may be accused of having committed or been involved in the commission of an international crime prior to their appointment by the organization. For example, it was alleged that Kurt Waldheim—a former Austrian UN secretary-general (1972–1981)—had been involved in the commission of war crimes during World War II.

Whether or not the ICC may require the arrest and surrender of an official or expert of an international organization in circumstances where that person is immune from arrest in the host state is not addressed in Article 98. The text of that provision makes no mention of immunities accruing to international organizations but is limited to "immunity of a person or property of a third State"[145] and "international agreements pursuant to which the consent of a sending State is required to surrender a person of that State to the Court."[146] While the declaration in Article 27(1) that the Statute applies equally, irrespective of official capacity, may be taken as including officials of international organizations,[147] this declaration cannot bind the organization as a nonparty to the Rome Statute and may not be regarded as a waiver of the immunity of the official.[148] The position remains the same even if all members of the organization are parties to the ICC Statute. Since the organization is a separate legal person, the immunity of its officials and experts is a right belonging to the organization and not to the member states.[149] Only the international organization itself can waive the immunities of its officials and experts[150] and nothing in the Statute can be regarded as having this effect.

Thus, while Article 98 does not preclude the ICC from requesting the surrender of officials and experts of international organizations who ordinarily possess immunity, an ICC party that is party to a treaty conferring such immunity would be violating that treaty if it arrests and surrenders the official or expert. To prevent the possibility that inconsistent obligations will arise, the ICC would be prudent not to request the surrender of officials or experts of international organizations until the organization has waived the immunity of that person.[151] In the case of UN officials, Article 19 of the Draft Relationship Agreement Between the United Nations and the ICC provides that the United Nations undertakes to waive any immunities that may otherwise apply where such persons are wanted for prosecution by the Court.[152] Importantly, the wording of this provision makes clear that it does not in itself constitute a waiver of immunity but, rather, an undertaking to waive the immunity. Therefore, if an actual case were to arise, a further act of waiver by the UN secretary-general would still be required.

Who Decides Whether a Person Is Entitled to Immunity in Another State?

A final question that must be addressed in the application of Article 98 is: Who decides whether a person sought by the ICC is entitled to state or diplomatic immunity or is covered by an agreement precluding surrender? Is that decision to be made by the ICC or by the state on whose territory the person is located? Furthermore, if the ICC is to make the decision, by what procedure is it to do so and will the decision bind the state to which the request for surrender is directed?

This provision is wide enough to cover treaty provisions conferring immunity on the representatives of states to international organizations since it is the member state and not the organization that is usually empowered to waive the immunity. See, e.g., UN Immunities Convention, supra note 35, Art. IV, §14.

Under Article 97, a state party that has received a request from the Court "in relation to which it identifies problems which may impede or prevent the execution of the request . . . shall consult with the Court without delay in order to resolve the matter." Since Article 98 states that "the Court may not proceed with a request for surrender" unless the conditions stipulated therein are met, the Court must first decide whether those conditions apply.[153] This reading is confirmed by Rule 195 of the ICC's Rules of Procedure and Evidence (Rules), which provides that a requested state that believes that a request for surrender raises a problem under Article 98, "shall provide any information relevant to assist the Court in the application of article 98." Moreover, "[a]ny concerned third State or sending State may provide additional information to assist the Court."[154]

Unfortunately, neither the Statute nor the Rules stipulate the procedure for the Court to follow in making this decision. However, on a matter of such importance, it can only be assumed that the state concerned is entitled to a decision by the pretrial chamber. Although this issue is not specifically covered in the list of functions of the pretrial chamber in Article 57 of the Statute, Rule 195 arguably grants procedural rights to concerned third states or sending states in any hearings before the pretrial chamber.

Despite the fact that the Court must, in the first place, make a decision under Article 98, there remains the issue whether that decision is binding on the requested state. Once a request for surrender is made, Article 89 of the Statute imposes an obligation on parties to comply. But since a request governed by Article 98 deals with a situation involving an ICC party's obligations to nonparties, leaving the final decision to the ICC is very far-reaching,[155] as any errors by the Court would render the ICC party concerned legally responsible to the nonparty. It may be argued that Article 59(2)(c) of the Statute—which provides that a person arrested at the request of the Court shall be brought before the competent judicial authorities of the custodial state for the purpose, inter alia, of determining whether his or her rights have been respected—allows those judicial authorities to make a decision on immunity. However, disagreements relating to whether or not a requested state is obliged to surrender a person to the Court are disputes "concerning the judicial function of the Court," which under Article 119 of the Statute "shall be settled by the decision of the Court."[156]

The national statutes that deal with the immunity of foreign officials when a request for arrest has been made by the ICC reveal that states have taken differing views on the identity of the body entitled to decide the issue. Both the Canadian Crimes Against Humanity and War Crimes Act of 2000[157] and the New Zealand International Crimes and International Criminal Court Act of 2000[158] leave the final decision on immunity to the ICC. On the other hand, the Australian and Swiss laws provide for consultation by their nation's executive branch with the

However, if the ICC advises that it intends to proceed with the request, the New Zealand authorities must comply.

ICC but leave the final decision to the relevant national authorities (the Australian attorney general and the Swiss Federal Council), whose decision appears to be binding on the courts.[159] Similarly, under the Maltese and United Kingdom implementing legislation, the relevant minister may certify with conclusive effect whether or not a state is a party to the Statute and whether a nonparty has waived its immunity.[160] More important, the relevant minister may also direct, after consultation with the ICC and the state concerned, that proceedings in the United Kingdom or Malta that would ordinarily be barred by state or diplomatic immunities shall not be taken.[161] Thus, a decision by the executive that immunities are available would appear to bind the courts of those countries. However, in the case of an official or diplomat of a nonparty, if the executive takes no view or finds that international immunities are not available, the UK or Maltese courts may decide for themselves whether arrest or surrender would be inconsistent with any immunity attaching to that person.

IV. CONCLUSION

The basic aims of those states that drafted the ICC Statute were "that the most serious crimes of concern to the international community as a whole must not go unpunished" and "to put an end to impunity for the perpetrators of these crimes."[162] These goals can be realized only to the extent that there is an attempt to bring to justice those who initiate and plan these crimes, as opposed to those who merely carry them out. Since history suggests that international crimes are often the work of state agents, a strategy of prosecuting right to the top of the planning chain will entail attempts to prosecute senior state officials. In all probability, the ICC will depend on cooperation from states to secure the custody of persons wanted for trial, so that the question of the immunity of state officials from arrest and surrender is likely to prove essential to the work of the Court.

When applied to criminal cases alleging the commission of international crimes, the rules of international law concerning immunity must, and do, strike a fair balance between the need to ensure that undue interference with the functioning of foreign states is avoided and the need to ensure that those who perpetrate international crimes are punished. Thus, very senior state officials, as well as serving diplomats and officials abroad on special mission, are entitled to immunity and may not be arrested or subjected to prosecution while in office or working as part of the mission. However, the position is different for other state officials as well as former officials (irrespective of the rank they held). The development of the rule of universal jurisdiction means that all states are entitled to prosecute those persons on their territory who are accused of committing certain international crimes irrespective of the nationality of the perpetrator or the place where the crime was committed. Where this rule contemplates prosecutions of state officials, those officials that are not entitled to immunity as a result of their current status (immunity ratione personae) may not rely on immunity ratione materiae in cases in which universal jurisdiction is exercised.

The parties to the ICC Statute have gone beyond the developments in customary international law. In subjecting all state officials to possible prosecution by the ICC and explicitly removing the international law immunities of senior officials, including heads of state (Article 27), the ICC parties agreed not only to prosecution by the ICC, but also to the possibility that senior officials may be arrested and surrendered to the ICC by other states. This conclusion seems unavoidable despite Article 98 of the Statute. Although it is not easy to dismiss the argument that Article 98 preserves the international law immunities of officials of ICC parties when they are in a third state, this interpretation must ultimately be rejected because it would render certain parts of Article 27 ineffective. The conferral of a power on states to arrest a visiting serving head of state or a serving ambassador is very far-reaching but is probably the only way in practice that such persons will be subjected to the jurisdiction of the Court. In view of the parties' determination under the ICC Statute to bring all perpetrators of international crimes to justice, the Statute must be construed in a way that permits this possibility.

Since state immunity is derived from the independence and sovereign equality of states,[163] it is appropriate to set this principle aside where a state is acting in support of an international tribunal. In such a case, the maxim par in parem non habet imperium ("An equal has no power over an equal") is hardly applicable because it is the ICC and not the arresting state that is ultimately seeking to exercise authority. However, it must be emphasized that this waiver of immunity vis-à-vis other states applies only when the ICC requests an arrest and surrender and not in relation to domestic prosecutions.

It must equally be emphasized that it is only parties to the ICC Statute that have waived the international law immunities (ratione personae) of their senior officials. Although the ICC may exercise jurisdiction over nationals and officials of nonparties, nothing in the Statute can affect the immunities that the officials of nonparties would otherwise enjoy. Accordingly, Article 98 of the Statute represents an instruction to the Court and to ICC parties not to interfere with those officials of nonparties who ordinarily possess immunity in international law.

depends, as the ICTY and the ICTR do, on the cooperation of existing national criminal justice systems.[1]

Part 9 of the Statute deals with the key issues of international cooperation with the Court. Provisions laying down an obligation for States to cooperate with, and assist, the Court in discharging its functions, however, are to be found also in other parts of the Statute. The first provision in Part 9 is Article 86 of the Statute, which provides that 'States Parties shall, in accordance with the provisions of this Statute, cooperate fully with the Court in its investigation and prosecution of crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court'. On the one hand, this provision makes it clear that there exists a general obligation for States to comply with requests of the Court. On the other hand, the wording of Article 86 also shows that the duty is conditional on requests from the Court that are made in accordance with the provisions of the Statute. Article 87 and the Rules of Procedure and Evidence adopted in relation thereto define some of the modalities to be followed with a view to complying with requests by the Court for cooperation. Article 88 provides that 'States Parties shall ensure that there are procedures available under their national law for all of the forms of cooperation which are specified under this Part [9]', that is, for arrest and surrender of persons to the Court (in accordance with the specific provisions under Articles 89–92 and 101–102) and for other forms of cooperation (as detailed in Articles 93–96 and 99). Articles 97–98 and 100 also set out rules of general application with respect to all forms of cooperation provided for under Part 9 of the Statute.

This chapter is devoted to the analysis of the general aspects of the obligation to cooperate with the ICC which apply in relation to both requests for arrest and surrender and requests for other forms of cooperation. Rather than a textual analysis of the relevant provisions of Part 9 (Articles 86–88, 97–98, and 100), it will follow a systematic approach, by addressing under separate headings those which appear as the most relevant issues arising thereunder. Where appropriate, a comparison will be made with the system of cooperation of the two ad hoc Tribunals as well as with the general features of inter-State judicial assistance mechanisms in criminal matters, with a view to underlining both the analogies and the specificity of the ICC cooperation regime.[2]

II. The Obligation to Cooperate

The ICC being established by treaty, only States becoming a party to the Statute will be in principle under an international obligation to cooperate with the Court.

[1] That cooperation of States will be vital to the proper functioning of the Court is shown in the previous chapter, in which the general features of the system of cooperation established under the Statute are discussed in depth.

[2] On this fundamental issue, see also the general analysis in Ch. 39 above.

Here lies one of the fundamental differences between the Court and the two ad hoc Tribunals which were established by a decision of the UN Security Council on the basis of Chapter VII of the UN Charter.[3]

A. The Legal Basis of the Obligation to Cooperate

In all matters of international cooperation and judicial assistance, Part 9 of the Statute systematically distinguishes between States Parties to the Statute and States that are not parties thereto. The obligations arising out of the Statute are obligations for States Parties only. In principle, cooperation cannot be imposed upon other States.[4]

For States which are not parties to the Statute, the Statute expressly provides for the possibility of either accepting the jurisdiction of the Court with respect to a specific case or undertaking to provide assistance to the Court on the basis of an ad hoc arrangement or agreement with the Court. Only a decision by the Security Council would place all Member States of the UN, whether or not parties to the Statute, in the same position with respect to the Court. Furthermore, although the Statute is not open to signature, ratification, or accession on the part of international subjects other than States, the possibility for the Court to avail itself of the cooperation by intergovernmental organizations or other international bodies is expressly provided for under the Statute.

1. Customary International Law

One may argue that, according to current customary international law, all States are under an obligation to cooperate at least with respect to some of the crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court (e.g. in relation to war crimes set out in the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949, the provisions of which are generally held to correspond to customary rules). But it is doubtful whether a general rule of this kind—were it deemed to exist under customary international law—may imply an obligation to comply with requests by the Court for cooperation outside the Statute framework, for States which do not become a party to it.[5]

[3] For a thorough analysis of this basic difference between the ad hoc Tribunals and the Court and implications arising thereof, see again the previous chapter.

[4] The Statute, as an international treaty, only binds States which are parties to it. This is in accordance with a well-established principle of international law. For a restatement of the rule, see Art. 34 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of the Treaties: 'A treaty does not create either obligations or rights for a third State without its consent' (UN Doc. A/CONF./39/27 (1969), reprinted in 8 ILM (1969) 679).

[5] This view was shared by the ICTY, according to which 'under customary international law, States, as a matter of principle, cannot be "ordered" either by other States or by international bodies', Ap. Ch., Judgment on the Request of the Republic of Croatia for Review of the Decision of Trial Chamber II of 18 July 1997, 29 October 1997, Blaškić, IT-95–14–AR108*bis* (hereinafter Blaškić Subpoena case), para. 26.

2. The Obligation to Cooperate with the ICTY and the ICTR

The two ad hoc Tribunals were established by a decision of the UN Security Council on the basis of Chapter VII of the UN Charter. The UN Member States were under an obligation to cooperate with the Tribunals in order to allow them to effectively carry out their mandates. The Secretary-General had stated in his report concerning the Yugoslav Tribunal that > the establishment of the International Tribunal on the basis of a Chapter VII decision . . . means that all States would be under an obligation to cooperate with the International Tribunal and to assist it in all stages of the proceedings to ensure compliance with requests for assistance in gathering evidence, hearing witnesses, suspects and experts, identification and location of persons and the service of documents. Effects shall also be given to orders issued by the Trial Chamber, such as warrants of arrest, search warrants, warrants for surrender or transfer of persons, and any other orders necessary for the conduct of the trial. In this connection, an order by a Trial Chamber for the surrender or transfer of persons to the custody of the International Tribunal shall be considered to be the application of an enforcement measure under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations.[6]

A general obligation to cooperate with the Tribunals was stated in operative paragraph 4 of SC Res. 827 (1993) and operative paragraph 2 of SC Res. 955 (1994), the resolutions establishing the Yugoslav and Rwanda Tribunals, respectively. These provisions both read as follows: '[The Security Council] [d]ecides that all States shall cooperate fully with the International Tribunal and its organs in accordance with the present resolution and the Statute of the International Tribunal and that consequently all States shall take any measures necessary under their domestic law to implement the provisions of the present resolution and the Statute, including the obligation of States to comply with requests for assistance or orders issued by a Trial Chamber under Article 29 [Article 28] of the Statute'.[7] The Statutes of both Tribunals reiterate the obligations spelt out in the resolutions. Article 29 of the ICTY Statute comprises both a general duty for States to cooperate and an obligation for States with regard to specific forms of legal assistance, although this is by no means an exhaustive list. Article 28 of the ICTR Statute contains identical language.[8] Additional rules have been laid down in the

(b) the taking of testimony and the production of evidence;

(virtually identical) Rules of Procedure and Evidence, adopted by the Tribunals pursuant to Article 15 of the Statute of the ICTY and Article 14 of the Statute of the ICTR.[9]

Another important basis for cooperation with the ICTY is the General Framework Agreement for Peace in Bosnia and Herzegovina, agreed upon by Bosnia and Herzegovina, Croatia and the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia/Serbia and Montenegro) in Dayton, Ohio, on 2 November 1995, and signed by them in Paris on 14 December 1995 (Dayton Peace Agreement).[10] States, e.g. the United States, have also concluded bilateral agreements with both Tribunals on the surrender of persons.[11] Finally, cooperation may also result from unilateral action. This is the case for Switzerland, not a Member State of the United Nations. In 1994, Switzerland decided that it would cooperate with both Tribunals and implement the provisions of their Statutes.[12]

3. The Legal Bases of the Obligation to Cooperate with the ICC

The obligation to lend cooperation and judicial assistance to the ICC, by contrast, derives its binding force from the Statute qua an international treaty.

Under certain circumstances, however, an obligation could also be imposed upon all Member States of the UN through a Security Council resolution adopted under Chapter VII of the UN Charter, as was the case with the ICTY and the ICTR. This exceptional legal basis may be available to the ICC in cases referred to the Court by the Security Council acting under Chapter VII of the UN Charter, pursuant to Article 13(c) of the Statute.[13] But an obligation to cooperate with the Court could also be imposed by the Security Council in cases referred to the Court by a State or initiated by the Prosecutor proprio motu should the Security Council decide that cooperation with the Court is needed in a situation amounting to a threat to the peace.

(c) the service of documents;
(d) the arrest or detention of persons;
(e) the surrender or the transfer of the accused to the International Tribunal.

[9] SC Res. 827 (1993) and 955 (1994) and the Statutes of the Tribunals are not the only legal bases for cooperation. In later years, the Security Council adopted Res. 1019 (1995), 1031 (1995), 1034 (1995), 1207 (1998), and 1244 (1999), all of which confirm the obligations for States arising out of Res. 827 (1993) and the Statute of the ICTY; in Res. 978 (1995) the Council did the same with regard to cooperation with the ICTR. Moreover, Res. 1031 (1995), 1037 (1996), 1088 (1996), and 1244 (1999) provide a mandate for international forces to take part in the arrest and surrender or transfer of persons. With the exception of Res. 1019 (1995) and 1034 (1995), all these resolutions have been adopted under Chapter VII of the Charter.

In all cases where the obligation to cooperate with the Court derives its binding force from a Security Council resolution adopted pursuant to the provisions of Chapter VII of the UN Charter, this legal basis has special consequences, as we shall see.

B. The General Obligation of States Parties to Cooperate with the Court

The general obligation to cooperate fully with the Court is expressly stated in the opening article of Part 9. According to Article 86, 'States Parties shall, in accordance with the provisions of th[e] Statute, cooperate fully with the Court in its investigation and prosecution of crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court'. This provision is broader in scope than subsequent provisions in Part 9 (with the exception of some provisions which, as we shall see, are also cast in general terms). According to the very wording of Article 86, the extent to which States Parties are under an obligation to cooperate with the Court appears not to be limited to the forms of cooperation and assistance specified in Part 9, but to encompass all the obligations provided for in the Statute.[14] This plain reading of Article 86 is supported by the drafting history of the provision in question.[15] Indeed Article 85 of the Draft Statute for the International Criminal Court adopted by the Preparatory Committee, to which Article 86 of the Statute corresponds, stated the general obligation of States Parties to cooperate with the Court referring, alternatively, to the provisions of Part 9 or to the entire Statute.[16] The second option was finally retained at the Rome Conference. It follows that in order to assess the content of the obligation of States Parties to cooperate with the Court, one has to look throughout the whole Statute. The Draft Statute also makes clear that the word 'Court' is to be understood to include its constituent organs, including the Prosecutor,[17] whose respective powers are to be distinguished according to the [14] This aspect is often overlooked in authors' writings. According to C. Kress, 'Penalties, Enforcement and Cooperation in the International Criminal Court Statute', 6 European Journal of Crime, Criminal Law and Criminal Justice (1998) 442, at 450, commenting upon the basic obligation of States Parties to fully cooperate with the Court: 'Taken as such, it will hardly [be] possible to deduce concrete duties from this principle. But the principle of full co-operation may well serve as an overarching interpretative guideline to concretize the obligations subsequently stated in this Part' (emphasis added).

[15] Cf. Art. 32 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, which admits recourse to 'supplementary means of interpretation, including the preparatory works' in order to confirm the meaning resulting from the application of the general rule of interpretation set out in Art. 31. That both provisions correspond to general rules of international law was found by the ICJ in the Arbitral Award of 31 July 1989 (Guinea Bissau v. Senegal) case and in the Territorial Dispute (Lybian Arab Jamahiriya v. Chad) case (ICJ Reports (1991) 53, at 69–70 and ICJ Reports (1994) 6, at 21, respectively).

provisions of Parts 5 and 6 of the Statute. Furthermore, that States Parties are under an obligation to 'cooperate fully with the Court' implies that they are duty-bound to act promptly and with all due diligence, in accordance with the general principle of good faith governing performance of international obligations. It was, therefore, not necessary to spell out explicitly, as the Draft Statute did, that States have to comply without undue delay.[18]

The States' obligation to cooperate with the Court as laid down in Part 9 of the Statute is generally to be discharged upon a request by the Court. This is unequivocally implied by Article 87, the first sentence of which reads as follows: 'The Court shall have the authority to make requests to States Parties for cooperation.' If the Court is vested with a general power to issue requests to States Parties for cooperation, it would be hard to view this provision as a sufficient basis for imposing an obligation which has no other basis in the Statute or elsewhere. It is submitted that for a request of the Court to be binding upon States Parties, two requirements should be met: the Court's authority to issue the request (which will hardly be possible to challenge, in the light of the overreaching provision of Article 87(1) ), and a specific duty of the requested State that is based in the Statute.[19]

No doubt, States Parties are under an obligation to cooperate with respect to requests by the Court for 'arrest and surrender' and 'other forms of assistance' under Part 9 (Articles 89–92 and 101–102; and Articles 93–96 and 99, respectively). Moreover, they have to give 'international cooperation' with respect to the Court's proceedings for 'offenses against its administration of justice' (Article 70) and 'enforcement of fines or forfeiture measures' ordered by the Court (Article 109). While requests for arrest and surrender and other forms of cooperation are to be complied with in accordance with the modalities detailed throughout Part 9, pursuant to Article 70(2), the conditions for providing international cooperation to the Court with respect to its proceedings over offences against its administration of justice 'shall be governed by the domestic laws of the requested State'. Similarly, under Article 109 of the Statute, States Parties shall give effect to fines and forfeiture measures ordered by the Court 'in accordance with the procedure of their national law'. Therefore, while States Parties are indeed under an obligation to comply with all the above-mentioned requests, they are free to determine the way in which they give effect to the Court's orders under both Article 70(2) and Article 109 of the Statute.

[18] Art. 85 of the Draft Statute reads as follows: 'States Parties shall, in accordance with the provisions of this [Part] [Statute], fully cooperate with the Court in its investigations and prosecutions of crimes under this Statute. States parties shall so cooperate without [undue] delay.' For an analysis of the preparatory works on this point, see C. Kress, 'Art. 86', in O. Triffterer (ed.), Commentary on the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court: Observers' Notes, Article by Article (1999) 1051, at 1053.

[19] The problem of definitively ascertaining the nature and scope of the powers with which the ICC has been entrusted is discussed infra in the text.

The question arises as to whether States Parties are also under an obligation to comply with requests of cooperation that the Court may assert to be based on its implied or inherent powers.[20] The answer is to be given with reference to the provisions of the Statute dealing with the powers of different organs of the Court and the Rules of Procedure and Evidence. It will ultimately depend on the interpretation to be given by the Court itself.[21]

If one compares the ICC with the ICTY and the ICTR, two remarks seem possible. On the one hand, the powers of the Court provided for under the Rules of Procedure and Evidence, not being judge-made, will hardly be questionable. On the other hand, the different legal basis with respect to that of the ICTY and the ICTR appears to give the Court a more limited discretion in resorting to powers that are not expressly provided for in the Statute. Therefore, the decisions of the ad hoc Tribunals asserting those powers on the basis of their having been established through a Security Council resolution, are of very little relevance here.[22] A Court established by treaty will have to be cautious when interpreting its powers.

[20] As it is known, the doctrine of 'implied powers' is well accepted under international law. The ICJ recognized it in express terms as early as 1949 (Reparation for Injuries Suffered in the Service of the United Nations, ICJ Reports (1949) 174, at 180–182) and applied it in several subsequent cases (e.g. in the Effects of Arbitral Awards of Compensation Made by the UN Administrative Tribunal case, ICJ Reports (1954) 47, at 56–57). Under this doctrine, international organizations are said to possess an implied power if the exercise of the power is necessary for the organization to attain its object and purpose as defined in its constituent instrument. Tribunals are also said to possess 'inherent powers' by virtue of their status as judicial bodies. For a clear appraisal of the distinction between the two doctrines, see D. Sarooshi, 'The Powers of the United Nations International Criminal Tribunals', 2 Max Planck Yearbook of UN Law (1998) 141, at 150.

[21] The issue is discussed by B. Swart and G. Sluiter, 'The International Criminal Court and International Criminal Co-operation', in H. A. M. Von Hebel, J. G. Lammers, and J. Schukking (eds.), Reflections on the International Criminal Court: Essays in Honour of Adriaan Bos (1998) 91, at 103. According to these authors, 'this question should not a priori be answered in the affirmative, although it should be borne in mind that given the detailed character of the Statute, it was clearly the objective of the framers to limit the powers of the Court to those set out in the Statute'. This in light of 'the detailed and apparently exhaustive character of Part 9 of the Statute'.

[22] With regard to the functions of the ICTY which are judicial in nature and not expressly provided for in the Statute, the Appeals Chamber stated in the Blaškić Subpoena case, supra note 5, at para. 27, that it preferred to speak of 'inherent powers', rather than of 'implied powers', and referred to the statement of the ICJ in the Nuclear Tests case (ICJ Reports (1974) 253, at 259–260). The Appeals Chamber found that the ICTY has the 'inherent power' to make a judicial finding concerning a State's failure to observe the provisions of the Statute or the Rules. The Court stated: 'The power to make a judicial finding is an inherent power; the International Tribunal must possess the power to make all those judicial determinations that are necessary for the exercise of its primary jurisdiction. This inherent power inures to the benefit of the International Tribunal in order that its basic judicial function may be fully discharged and its judicial role safeguarded' (ibid., at para. 33). The Appeals Chamber had earlier found in the Tadić case that it has the 'jurisdiction to determine its own jurisdiction' as '[i]t is a necessary component in the exercise of the judicial function and does not need to be expressly provided for in the constitutive documents of . . . tribunals, although this is often done' (Ap. Ch., Decision on the Defence Motion for Interlocutory Appeal on Jurisdiction of 2 October 1995, Tadić, IT-94-1-AR72, para. 18). Cf. M. Buteau and G. Oosthuizen, 'When the Statute and Rules are Silent: The Inherent Powers of the Tribunal', in R. May et al. (eds.), Essays on ICTY Procedure and Evidence in Honour of Gabrielle Kirk McDonald (2001) 65.

According to the basic rule governing treaty interpretation, Statute provisions are to be construed in the light of their object and purpose. This also applies to provisions conferring powers on the Court vis-à-vis States Parties. In this respect, it is at least arguable that the purpose of the Statute is to create a court as effective as an international court could in abstracto be. While States Parties intended to establish a court with the power to investigate and prosecute persons allegedly responsible for crimes within its jurisdiction, this was only to the extent, and under the conditions, provided for in the Statute. The Statute does not necessarily purport to maximize the powers of the Court, and the corresponding States Parties' obligations. Therefore, the Court will have to reckon with this when asserting implied or inherent powers that are not expressly provided for in the Statute or the Rules of Procedure and Evidence. The Court will anyway have to rely on States in order to enforce compliance with its requests. Moreover, should the problem arise whether the Court's powers be given a different scope depending on the trigger mechanism by which the procedure is set in motion in a given case, the solution should be in favour of the stricter interpretation in all cases.

Although the Court's power to address a request for cooperation to States has to be made in accordance with the Statute, this does not provide the requested States with a way to challenge the request on the ground that it does not comply with the Statute. It only allows States to consult with the Court. This raises the important question of who has the final say in case the Court and the requested State disagree with regard to the Court's right to request cooperation and the States' duty to comply with the said request. Under Article 119 of the Statute, the Court is expressly endowed with the power to determine any judicial question, with a decision binding on States Parties.[23] Such a power conforms with the Court's status as a judicial organ.

C. Cooperation by Non-Parties States

Being a treaty, the Statute does not impose in principle obligations on States which have not become parties to it. However, various provisions in the Statute may be considered as invitations to cooperate to such States. The most far-reaching provision to this effect is Article 12(3). It provides that a State which is not a party may accept the jurisdiction of the Court in individual cases if [23] Cf., on this point, the critical remarks by Swart and Sluiter, supra note 21, at 104: 'An explicit basis in the Statute would have the additional advantage of making it perfectly clear that the Court has the final say in any dispute arising under Part 9. It is doubtful whether that basis can be found in Article 119 of the Statute. The provisions on the settlement of disputes in this article seem to have regard to disputes between States Parties and not to disputes between States Parties and the Court.' It is our view that, while Art. 119(2), of the Statute only concerns dispute settlement between States Parties, it is not in doubt that, under Art. 119(1), the Court will have the final say in any dispute with a State Party challenging the legality of its requests. Indeed this would be a 'dispute concerning the judicial functions of the Court'.

Scanned by CamScanner

acceptance is required for the Court to be able to exercise its jurisdiction. Another provision is Article 87(5). Pursuant to this provision, the Court may invite any State that is not a party to the Statute to provide assistance on the basis of an ad hoc arrangement, an international agreement, or any other appropriate basis. Cooperation may also be provided unilaterally by the non-parties States.

Apart from this, the distinction between States Parties and other States is the unavoidable consequence of the Court being established on the basis of a treaty. It is only when the Security Council has referred a case to the Court that the distinction between States Parties and non-parties States loses significance. However, the nature and the content of the obligation to cooperate do not vary, nor are the limits to such an obligation and the remedies available in case of non-compliance any different.

1. Acceptance of Jurisdiction by way of Declaration under Article 12(3)

Third States which have accepted the jurisdiction of the Court with respect to a crime by way of a declaration lodged with the Registrar of the Court pursuant to Article 12(3), 'shall cooperate with the Court without any delay or exception in accordance with Part 9'.[24] From the interpretation which has been given of the opening article of Part 9, according to which Article 86 sets out a general obligation to cooperate with the Court in accordance with the provisions of the whole Statute, it follows that the position of a third State which has accepted the jurisdiction of the Court with respect to a certain crime becomes very close to that of States Parties to the Statute, with regard to that crime.[25] In view of the language of Article 12(3), which requires cooperation 'without any delay or exception', it is more than doubtful that the Court may, pursuant to Article 12(3), conclude an [24] This in accordance with the general principle embodied in Art. 35 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of the Treaties: 'An obligation arises for a third State from a provision of a treaty if the parties to the treaty intend the provision to be the means of establishing the obligation and the third State expressly accepts that obligation in writing'. Cf. G. Palmisano, 'The International Criminal Court and Third States', in F. Lattanzi and W. A. Schabas (eds.), Essays on the Rome Statute of the ICC (1999) 391, at 393–394, for the view that '[f]rom the standpoint of its legal qualification, Art. 12(3) should be considered a treaty stipulation in favour of third States. This provision allows, in fact, third States interested in effectively prosecuting a given crime, to accede, in relation to that crime only, to the judicial mechanism provided for by the Statute, on condition that they expressly accept the Court's jurisdiction and the obligation of cooperation and judicial assistance set out in Part 9 of the Statute. . . . To be more precise, when the third State lodges its declaration with the Registrar, a new agreement between the States Parties to the Statute, on the one hand, and the third State, on the other, relating to the exercise of the ICC's jurisdiction over the crime in question, would be concluded' (emphasis added). Cf. also Ch. 16 above.

[25] This is not to say that the State which has accepted the jurisdiction of the Court should no longer be considered a third State. It would hardly be possible, for example, to conclude that this State is under an obligation to contribute to the financing of the Court. For the opposite view, see Palmisano, supra note 24, at 393, according to whom 'once a State has accepted the Court's jurisdiction over a specific case, this State should no longer be considered a third State, as its position becomes equivalent to that of a State party to the Statute'.

agreement with a third State accepting its jurisdiction with respect to a given crime which limits, or provides exceptions to, that State's obligations of cooperation under Part 9.

2. Ad Hoc Arrangements, Agreements, or Other Appropriate Basis under Article 87(5)

Furthermore, States which are not parties to the Statute may conclude with the Court an agreement to provide assistance under Part 9. Article 87(5) expressly empowers the Court to 'invite any State not party to [the] Statute to provide assistance under this Part on the basis of an ad hoc arrangement, an agreement with such State or any other appropriate basis'. When an ad hoc arrangement with respect to the investigation and prosecution of a given crime within the jurisdiction of the Court or an agreement to cooperate with the Court in a wider set of cases is concluded with a State not party, such a State undertakes an international obligation to cooperate with the Court vis-à-vis all States Parties to the Statute.[26] The difference with declarations made pursuant to Article 12 is that cooperation on the basis of Article 87 does not necessarily imply acceptance of the jurisdiction of the Court by the State which is not a party. Moreover, this State is free to determine how far it is prepared to go in assuming an obligation to arrest and surrender. The extent of the obligation to cooperate will depend on the content of the agreement. In this respect, however, it seems hardly likely that a non-party State will bind itself to an obligation which is broader in scope than that provided for under the Statute for State Parties. The third State will probably accept to cooperate with the Court to a more limited extent, e.g. by only undertaking to give some, but not all, forms of cooperation specified under Part 9.

D. Cooperation by International Organizations

The Statute is not open to signature, ratification, or accession on the part of international subjects other than States. Article 87(6), however, expressly envisages the possibility for the Court to avail itself of cooperation by intergovernmental organizations. The ICTY and ICTR Statutes do not contain an analogous provision; however, practice of the ICTY shows instances of this type of cooperation.

[26] For the view that the Court concluding an agreement with a third State under Art. 87(5), acts in fact as a common organ of the States Parties to the Statute, see Palmisano, supra note 24, at 405–406: 'By including in the Statute the provision at issue, States Parties have indeed decided to bind themselves reciprocally to grant the Court, as their common organ, the power to carry out not only an internal state activity, of a judicial nature, but also an external state activity, concerning the conclusion of agreements of cooperation and judicial assistance with States which are not parties to the Statute. These agreements are to be reached by the Court on behalf of the States parties to the Statute, which are thus the subjects entitled to request the implementation of such arrangements' (emphasis added).

1. Cooperation with the ICTY

As has been noted, several resolutions adopted by the Security Council envisaged cooperation of international bodies with the ICTY. Moreover, with regard to execution of arrest warrants, Rule 59*bis* of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence provides that 'on the order of a Judge, the Registrar shall transmit to an appropriate authority or international body a copy of a warrant for the arrest of an accused, on such terms as the Judge may determine, together with an order for his prompt transfer to the Tribunal in the event that he be taken into custody by that authority or international body'. This rule was adopted to provide for the transmission of arrest warrants to IFOR, taking into account that Rules 55–59 were drafted with States, and not international organizations, in mind. However, even before such a rule was adopted, the ICTY had held to be able to transmit orders and warrants for arrest to IFOR on the basis of Article 20(2) of the Statute.[27]

Several indictees were brought into the custody of the ICTY by the Prosecutor in cooperation with the UN Transitional Authority in Eastern Slavonia, Baranja, and Western Sirmium (UNTAES) in Croatia and by the NATO Implementation force (IFOR) in Bosnia-Herzegovina.[28]

An important aspect of the Dayton Peace Agreement was the establishment of IFOR, envisaged in Article VI of its Annex 1-A and authorized by SC Res. 1031 (1995). Under the General Framework Agreement for Peace in Bosnia and Herzegovina and the Annexes thereto, IFOR-contributing States were granted the right to use military force in the implementation of the Peace Agreement. Several articles in the Annexes specifically refer to the ICTY, reaffirming the Parties' duty to cooperate with it and comply with its orders.[29] Although there has [27] See e.g. Judge Jorda's Order for the Transmission to IFOR of Indictments and Arrest Warrants, 24 December 1995, All Cases, ordering that 'copies of indictments and arrest warrants issued to [that] date by the Tribunal be transmitted to IFOR and that any indicted person detained by IFOR be taken into custody, immediately informed of the charges against him and transferred as soon as reasonably practicable to the International Tribunal' (reproduced in ICTY Judicial Reports (1994–1995) 1163). For the opinion that 'the Tribunal's Statute does not exclude the possibility of arrest by international bodies', for 'Article 20(2) of the Statute is drafted in general language not limited to arrest by States', see J. R. W. D. Jones, 'The Implications of the Dayton Peace Agreement for the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia', 7 EJIL (1996) 226, at 240.

[28] For an account, see S. D. Murphy, 'Progress and Jurisprudence of the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia', 93 AJIL (1999) 57, at 75–76, discussing in particular the arrest and transfer to the ICTY of Dokmanović, the first suspect to be arrested by UN officials in the former Yugoslavia, and the Trial Chamber decision that the arrest was justified and legal (T.Ch.II, 22 October 1997, Dokmanović, IT-95-13a-PT).

[29] Cf. SC Res. 1031 (1995), recognizing under para. 5 'that the parties shall cooperate fully with all entities involved in implementation of the peace settlement, as described in the Peace Agreement, or which are otherwise authorized by the Security Council, including the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia, and that the parties have in particular authorized the multinational force [IFOR . . .] to take such actions as required, including the use of necessary force, to ensure compliance with Annex 1-A of the Peace Agreement'. been some debate on the question of which provision of Article VI of Annex 1-A permitted IFOR to arrest persons on request of the ICTY and transfer them to its seat, there is no doubt that Article VI granted IFOR the right to do so.[30] As far as the ICTY itself is concerned, initially it seems to have based IFOR's powers to arrest persons on paragraph 4 of Article VI. This paragraph provides that the North Atlantic Council may 'establish further additional duties and responsibilities for the IFOR in implementing this Annex'. Later, the Tribunal pointed at the general power of IFOR to 'assist the movement of organizations in the accomplishment of humanitarian missions' pursuant to paragraph 3(b) of Article VI as the legal basis.[31] In Res. 1088 (1996), the Security Council authorized the establishment of SFOR as the legal successor to IFOR.

The question has been raised whether Annex 1-A to the Dayton Peace Agreement imposes on IFOR and SFOR a duty to arrest persons and transfer them to the ICTY. The position of the ICTY on this issue is that it does not.[32] The ICTY stated that IFOR was neither a party to the Dayton Agreement nor specifically obliged to cooperate with the Tribunal. However, it added, that IFOR was 'in the unique position of possessing both the legal and logistical capacity to assist the Tribunal in its work'.[33] Another remark worth quoting is that, in the opinion of the ICTY, some 'forms of assistance to facilitate the implementation of the Tribunal's mandate were not always forthcoming during the reporting period, most obviously with respect to the arrest of accused persons'. Report, the ICTY noted an apparent willingness on the part of SFOR to use its authority under the Dayton Peace Agreement to enforce the Agreement, 'a willingness that was notably lacking in the previous years with respect to the provisions concerning the Tribunal'.[34]

Two other resolutions adopted by the Security Council impose a duty on international bodies to cooperate with the ICTY. The first is SC Res. 1037 (1996), establishing UNTAES. The second is SC Res. 1244 (1999), establishing KFOR. Paragraph 14 of the latter resolution '[d]emands full cooperation by all concerned, including the international security presence', with the ICTY.

2 Cooperation with the ICC

According to Article 87(6) of the ICC Statute, '[t]he Court may ask any intergovernmental organization to provide information or documents. The Court may also ask for other forms of cooperation and assistance which may be agreed upon with such an organization and which are in accordance with its competence or mandate'. Moreover, the Prosecutor may seek information from any source, including 'organs of the United Nations, intergovernmental or non-governmental organizations, or other reliable sources that he or she deems appropriate', for the purpose of initiating an investigation (Article 15(2) ).[35] Information so provided will be admissible as evidence at trial according to the general rules on admissibility.

The Statute does not rule out the possibility that an international organization has a duty to provide information to the Court when requested to do so, e.g. on the basis of a resolution of the Security Council acting under Chapter VII of the UN Charter.[36] Authority to seek information should not imply that there is a prohibition on accepting information which is submitted without having been requested by a constituent organ of the Court.

Other forms of cooperation and assistance, namely arrest and surrender of suspects or accused, preservation and collection of evidence and service of judicial documents, are subject to the conclusion of an agreement with the organization in question. The condition that such an agreement be in accordance with the organization's competence or mandate conforms to the general principle of international law according to which international organizations may only exercise powers which are attributed to them by their respective constituent instruments. This principle is further restated in Article 54(3)(c), according to which the Prosecutor may seek the cooperation of any 'intergovernmental organization or arrangement in accordance with its respective competence and/or mandate'. As with regard to the provision of information or documents, cooperation is, in principle, voluntary, but again the legal situation may change in case of a Security Council decision under Chapter VII of the UN Charter.

Due to the complementary nature of the Court's jurisdiction, it is very likely that the Court will find itself investigating and prosecuting crimes where the accused or the relevant evidence are located in areas where an international force established or authorized by the Security Council may suitably intervene. At the Rome Conference there was a lengthy debate as to whether or not peacekeeping forces should be mentioned in the Statute. The compromise achieved was to add the term 'arrangement' in Article 54(3)(c), in order to ensure that peacekeeping forces are included. Even in the absence of an express reference in Article 87(6), the Court is thus in a position to cooperate with all kinds of peacekeeping forces, acting within their mandate.[37]

III. The Implementation of the Obligation to Cooperate

States Parties are under an international obligation to enact any implementing legislation necessary to permit them to comply with requests of the Court, unless, of course, no amendment to national law is needed for them to do so.

A. The Obligation to Make National Procedures Available for Cooperation with the Court

Article 88 of the Statute expressly provides that 'States Parties shall ensure that there are procedures available under their national law for all of the forms of cooperation which are specified under this Part [9]'.

1. Irrelevance of Internal Law with Respect to the Observance of Treaties

According to a well-established principle of international law, a State may not invoke provisions (or absence of provisions) of its internal law in order to avoid [37] For this conclusion, based on the general rule of systematical interpretation according to which the complementary rules in Part 5 and Part 9 must be coherent, see C. Kress and K. Prost, 'Art. 87', in Triffterer (ed.), supra note 18, 1055, at 1065.

compliance with its international obligations.[38] This rule is restated with respect to treaty obligations by Article 27 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, which reads as follows: 'A party may not invoke the provisions of its internal law as justification for its failure to perform a treaty.'

2. The Implementation of the ICTY and ICTR Statutes

Even in the absence of an express provision to this effect in the ICTY and ICTR Statutes, SC Resolutions 827 and 955 establishing the ad hoc Tribunals mandated all States to 'take any measures necessary under their domestic law to implement the provisions of the present resolution and the Statute, including the obligation of States to comply with requests for assistance or orders issued by a Trial Chamber under Article 29 [Article 28] of the Statute'.[39]

Security Council Resolutions 827 (1993) and 955 (1994) thus distinguished between two types of obligations. On the one hand, there is the obligation to cooperate fully with the Tribunal in each individual case. On the other, there is the obligation to take any measures necessary under domestic law to implement the provisions of the resolutions and the Statutes, including the obligation to comply with requests for assistance or orders issued under Articles 29 or 28 of the Statutes. Which measures are necessary largely depends on the domestic law of each Member State. One may expect, however, that most Member States have to enact imple-

[38] See e.g. the Advisory Opinion of the PCIJ in the Treatment of Polish Nationals and Other Persons of Polish Origin or Speech in the Danzig Territory case, 1932 PCIJ Series A/B, No. 44, at 24: 'a State cannot adduce as against another State its own Constitution with a view to evading obligations incumbent upon it under international law or treaties in force'. See also Art. 3 of the Draft Articles on State Responsibility adopted on second reading by the ILC at its fifty-third session (UN Doc. A/56/10): 'The characterization of an act of State as internationally wrongful is governed by international law. Such characterization is not affected by the characterization of the same act as lawful by internal law.'

[39] Following the vote on Res. 827, the need for implementing legislation was raised by a number of SC members, including the United States, the United Kingdom, and China. The US Ambassador explained that 'States may find it necessary to take measures under their domestic law to enable them to implement the provisions of the Statute, and [the resolution] pledges them to endeavour to take any such measures as soon as possible'. The Chinese Ambassador, although objecting to the Chapter VII basis of the Yugoslav Tribunal, recognized that 'United Nations Member States must implement [the Statute] to fulfil their obligations provided for in the Charter'. Referring to requests for cooperation under Art. 29 of the Statute, the British Ambassador indicated that 'domestic procedures will be needed to give effect to the obligation [. . .] to comply with a request or order concerning the transfer of an accused to the International Tribunal' (UN Doc. S/PV.3217 (1993) at 15, 33, and 19). The issue resurfaced during Security Council debates on the Rwanda Tribunal, when the British Ambassador remarked that '[i]t will be necessary for States to establish their own procedures for implementing their obligations under the Statute. Domestic procedures will be needed to give effect to the obligations under Article 28 of the Statute to comply with a request or order concerning the surrender and transfer of an accused to the International Tribunal'. Similarly, the French Ambassador characterized Res. 955 as a 'solution, which is binding on all States and hence requires that they meet the requests of the Tribunal and, if necessary, adapt their domestic legislation to enable them to fully cooperate with it' (UN Doc. S/PV.3453 (1994) at 6 and 3, respectively).

menting legislation in order to be able to satisfy requests for the arrest and transfer or surrender of individual persons as well as for other forms of cooperation.

Following the adoption of Resolutions 827 and 955, a number of States have passed legislation regulating the cooperation with one or both ad hoc Tribunals.[40] The ICTY has tried to stimulate the enactment of implementing legislation by issuing Guidelines.[41] In the Fall of 1993, experts of the Member States of the Council of Europe held a meeting in which they discussed problems of implementation. The results of these discussions have influenced implementing Statutes of some European States.

Nevertheless, there have been cases in which a failure properly to implement the Statutes in domestic law led to non-compliance with requests or orders by the Tribunals. In the Tadić case, for instance, the ICTY asked Germany to defer to its competence on 8 November 1994. However, because Germany had not yet passed implementing legislation, Tadić could not immediately be surrendered. Legislation followed almost six months later, and Tadić was then surrendered to the Tribunal in April 1995.[42] In 1997, a US District Court denied a request of the US government for the surrender of Elizaphan Ntakirutimana to the ICTR on the grounds that a proper treaty basis for the surrender of the accused did not exist.[43]

[40] Up to the end of 1998, twenty-one States had enacted legislation implementing the provisions of one or both Statutes: Australia, Austria, Belgium, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Croatia, Denmark, Finland, France, Germany, Hungary, Iceland, Italy, Ireland, The Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, United Kingdom, United States. For the text and translation of a number of implementing laws, see the first three Yearbooks of the ICTY. For an analysis, see S. Although they do not have any clear legal status, the Guidelines are intended to assist States in the drafting of adequate implementing legislation. It has to be recalled, however, that the Guidelines were published after implementing legislation had already entered into force in nine States, namely Denmark, Finland, France, Iceland, Italy, The Netherlands, Norway, Spain, and Sweden.

However, a second request for the surrender of the same person was later granted by the same court and upheld by the United States Court of Appeals, Fifth Circuit.[44] More serious is the case of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) ('FRY'), which repeatedly invoked national legislation (in particular, a constitutional prohibition on the extradition of its nationals) as an excuse for not cooperating with the ICTY. This led the Security Council to adopt Resolution 1207 (1998), in which it called again upon FRY and other States to take any measures necessary under their domestic law to implement the provisions of the Statute of the ICTY and affirmed that a State may not invoke provisions of domestic law as an excuse for its failure to perform its binding obligations under international law.[45]

Article 29 of the ICTY Statute, which reiterates the obligation to cooperate laid down in operative paragraph 4 of SC Res. 827 (1993), was held by the ICTY to lay down not a generic obligation, but a quite specific one, although leaving States some choice or leeway in identifying the modalities of its fulfilment. The ICTY characterized the obligation to cooperate as an 'obligation of conduct (obligation de conduite) requiring States to perform a specifically determined action' and concluded, accordingly, that by not enacting implementing legislation, a State would be in breach of its obligation to cooperate with the International Tribunal as from the entry into force of the Statute.[46]

3. The Obligation under Article 88 of the ICC Statute

Notwithstanding the express provision of Article 88 of the ICC Statute, States Parties' obligation to cooperate with the Court under the Statute does not seem amenable to the same interpretation.[47] There is no known drafting history to the

More precisely, this is an "obligation of conduct" (obligation de conduite) or "obligation of means" (obligation de moyens) namely, an obligation requiring States to perform a specifically determined action, unlike "obligations of results" (obligation de résultat), which require States to bring about a certain situation or result, leaving them free to do so by whatever means they choose. . . . It is apparent from the above that, by not enacting implementing legislation, since 1993 the Republic of Croatia has undisputedly violated its obligation to implement the Statute, stemming from the relevant Security Council resolution as well as Article 29 of the Tribunal's Statute' (emphasis in the original).

provision in question, for no express requirement to enact implementing legislation was included in the ILC Draft Statute for an International Criminal Court of 1994 or in the Preparatory Committee's Draft Statute for the International Criminal Court referred to the Rome Conference. Anyway, one could hardly read the provision of Article 88 as setting out an obligation of conduct, even if one should accept the controversial distinction between obligations of conduct and obligations of result.[48] Article 88 does not require States to adopt a course of conduct specifically defined, since there is no precise determination of its content. Article 88 clearly sets out an obligation of result (or an obligation of prevention, which is nothing but a 'negative' obligation of result, should one assume prevention of non-compliance with requests of the Court as the goal of Article 88), which is only combined with a description of the means to be set up in order to achieve the goal of compliance with all requests for cooperation and assistance specified under Part 9. What is at stake is the end result to be achieved, not the means to be set up: only a failure to cooperate with the Court will amount to a breach of the obligation to cooperate, giving rise to the international responsibility of the State actually requested to cooperate in a concrete case. In other words, as we shall see further, a breach will exist only when the conduct of the responsible State has prevented compliance with a Court's request. In determining the time of the breach of the obligation to cooperate, the decisive element will be when the result is not attained, not the actual conduct of the State.[49]

[48] See e.g. P.-M. Dupuy, 'Reviewing the Difficulties of Codification: On Ago's Classification of Obligations of Means and Obligations of Result in Relation to State Responsibility', 10 EJIL (1999) 371, at 377: '[this c]lassification of States obligations . . . is of no use because it is, at one and at the same time, too rigid and approximate. This position, already expressed some 15 years ago by authors such as Jean Combacau, Ian Brownlie and the present author is most generally shared in the legal literature'. See also J. Crawford, Second Report on State Responsibility, 17 March 1999, UN Doc. A/CN.4/498, para. 89, reviewing the distinctions between obligations of conduct, result, and prevention, as set out in Arts. 20, 21(1), and 23 of the Draft Articles on State Responsibility adopted on first reading by the ILC in 1996: 'there is clearly a strong case for simply deleting them. They have been criticized by a number of Governments as over-refined. They have been widely criticized in the literature. Their relationship to similar concepts under national law is obscure and even contradictory.'

[49] The possibility should also be excluded of applying, mutatis mutandis, with respect to a State Party's failure to enact implementing legislation as mandated by Art. 88 of the ICC Statute, the reasoning of the ICTY holding the importance of the obligation, and the corresponding gravity of its violation, as the decisive factor for the identification of the momentum a quo a State could be held internationally responsible. The ICTY stated: 'Normally, the maintenance or passage of legislation inconsistent with international rules generates State responsibility . . . only when such legislation is concretely applied. By contrast, in the case of torture, the mere fact of keeping in force or passing legislation contrary to the international prohibition of torture generates international States responsibility' (T.Ch.II, Judgment of 10 December 1998, Furundžija, IT-95-17/1-T, paras. 149–150). In our view, this reasoning can only apply with regard to peremptory norms of general international law. It cannot be extended to obligations to cooperate with an International Criminal Court, which are indeed of a procedural character. See also Crawford, supra note 48, at para. 78: 'Whether the enactment of inconsistent legislation constitutes itself a breach of international law depends on the content and importance of the primary rule' (emphasis added).

Article 88 was introduced into the Statute during the Rome Conference as part of the compromise achieved to resolve the critical issue of the relevance, if any, of national laws under Part 9. Articles 89 and 93, concerning requests for arrest and surrender and other forms of cooperation, respectively, provide that States Parties shall comply with requests by the Court 'in accordance with the provisions of this Part and the procedure under their national law'. In order to avoid any misuse of these references, Article 88 makes it clear that a State Party cannot use the absence of adequate procedures under national law in order to justify a refusal of a request.[50]

All that can be deduced from the provision in question is a restatement of the general obligation already incumbent upon States Parties to the Statute to introduce into their legislation any change which may be necessary in order to ensure compliance with requests by the Court for cooperation or assistance in accordance with the Statute.[51] The meaning of Article 88 is thus to expressly invite States to act quickly in taking appropriate measures under domestic law, in order to avoid delays in (or failure of) compliance with the Court's requests as has been far too often the case with respect to the ICTY's requests or orders.[52]

B. Modalities of Implementation of the Obligation to Cooperate with the Court: A Comparison with Inter-State Mechanisms Pursuant to Treaties

Article 87(1)–(3) and Article 100 set out some general provisions which apply to all forms of cooperation and assistance, concerning the channel for transmission of the Court's requests, the language of the requests and their supporting documents, the obligation of confidentiality on the part of the requested State and, finally, the partition of costs between the Court and the requested State.

As far as these features are concerned, the system of cooperation which is established under the ICC Statute appears to follow the traditional inter-State cooperation model. With regard to cooperation with the ICTY and the ICTR, instead, in the absence of any express provision to this effect in the Tribunals' Statutes and Rules of Procedure and Evidence, States have dealt with these modalities in very different ways. The implementing legislation of the ICTY Statute enacted by some States provides that any order or request of the International Tribunal should be addressed to a specific central body, which then [50] See K. Prost, 'Art. 88', in Triffterer (ed.), supra note 18, 1069.

[51] Supra note 38.

[52] In this respect, the same value should be given, e.g., to Rule 58 of the ICTY Rules of Procedure and Evidence. In the relevant part, this provision reads as follows: 'The obligation laid down in Article 29 of the Statute shall prevail over any legal impediment to the surrender or transfer of the accused or a witness to the Tribunal which may exist under . . . national law . . .'.

channels it to the relevant prosecutorial or judicial agencies.[53] Other national laws are more flexible.[54]

Article 87(1)(a) of the ICC Statute provides that 'requests shall be transmitted through the diplomatic channel or any other appropriate channel as may be designated by each State Party upon ratification, acceptance, approval or accession.'[55] According to Article 87(1)(b), '[w]hen appropriate, without prejudice to the provisions of subparagraph (a), requests may also be transmitted through the International Criminal Police Organization or any appropriate regional organization' (Article 87(1)(b) ).[56] Under Rule 177(1) of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence, '[c]ommunications concerning the national authority charged with receiving requests for cooperation . . . shall provide all relevant information about such authorities'. In addition, paragraph 2 of Rule 177 states that also '[w]hen an intergovernmental organization is asked to assist the Court under Article 87, [54] Thus, for instance, Section 6(1) of the Austrian Federal Law on Co-operation with the International Tribunals of 1996 provides that communication with the International Tribunals shall pass through the Ministry of Foreign Affairs; however, Section 6(3) provides that '[i]n urgent cases as part of official criminal police assistance, direct communication between the Austrian authorities and the International Tribunal or communication through the International Criminal Police Organisation INTERPOL shall be permitted'. Similarly, Section 2 of the Finnish Act on the Jurisdiction of the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia of 1995, after designating the Ministry of Justice as the authority competent to receive 'requests and notifications' from the International Tribunal, provides that the International Tribunal is allowed directly to contact the competent authorities either through diplomatic channels or through INTERPOL. Under Section 3 of the Norwegian Act Relating to the Incorporation into Norwegian Law of UN SC Resolution on the Establishment of an International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia of 1994, legal assistance to the International Tribunal is the responsibility of 'Norwegian courts and other authorities'. For references, see supra note 40.

[55] Art. 87(1)(a), continues as follows: 'Subsequent changes to the designation shall be made by each State Party in accordance with the Rules of Procedure and Evidence'. In this regard, Rule 176(3), provides that '[t]he Registrar shall be the recipient of any communication from States concerning subsequent changes in the designation of the national channels charged with receiving requests for cooperation, . . . and shall, upon request, make such information available to States Parties as may be appropriate'.

[56] Art. 86(1) of the Draft Statute for the International Criminal Court referred to the Rome Conference contained identical language. The same is true with respect to other technical aspects dealt with under Art. 87 of the Statute. See Report of the Preparatory Committee on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, supra note 16.

paragraph 6, the Registrar shall, when necessary, ascertain its designated channel of communication and obtain all relevant information relating thereto'.

These provisions appear to take the lowest common denominator of modalities for transmission of requests for cooperation between States. While leaving States the option to designate a different channel as they may deem appropriate, Article 87(1) retains the traditional device for transmission through the diplomatic channel as the default option for communication of the Court's requests to the national authorities of the State concerned. Some bilateral and multilateral extradition treaties instead provide for direct communication between the Ministries of Justice or other authorities designated by the Parties as an option generally available to States Parties or subject to specific consent by the States concerned.[57] Mutual legal assistance treaties typically provide for the direct exchange of information between central authorities—normally an agency of the Ministries of Justice—designated by each State Party, bypassing both the diplomatic channel and the involvement of national courts (though a judicial authority may still be involved in the process of execution of a request for assistance); direct communication between judicial authorities is only provided for under exceptional circumstances.[58] Even under these modalities, international cooperation is usually slow and ineffective.

In this respect, the relevant provisions of the ICC Statute appear not to overcome the main flaws of inter-State cooperation, namely the length of time it takes for proceedings to go through the administrative process.[59] As to Interpol, which is used by some States for transmission of extradition requests, a State Party is free to indicate whether or not requests for cooperation by the Court can be transmitted to it through Interpol (or a regional organization). It is to be hoped that States becoming parties to the Statute will make available to the Court the channel of communication which best serves the interest of fast and efficient processing of cooperation requests. For, as may be inferred from Article 87(1), the channel of communication which is thereby established between the Court and each State Party to the Statute is exclusive and any request should, therefore, be addressed to the authority designated.[60]

[58] See e.g. Art. 15 of the European Convention on Mutual Assistance in Criminal Matters of 20 April 1959, ETS No. 30. Cf. [59] Execution of requests, as a general rule, in accordance with the law of the requested State is another main flaw in inter-State cooperation procedures. Under the ICC Statute, States Parties shall comply with requests by the Court for arrest and surrender and other forms of cooperation in accordance with the relevant procedure under their national law (see Art. 89(1) and Art. 99(1) ). This aspect and the difficulties arising thereof, with respect to both 'arrest and surrender' and 'other forms of cooperation', are discussed in Chs. 41 and 42 below.

With regard to the language of the Court's requests, Article 87(2) reads as follows: 'Requests for cooperation and any documents supporting the request shall either be in or be accompanied by a translation into an official language of the requested State or one of the working languages of the Court, in accordance with the choice made by that State upon ratification, acceptance, approval or accession.'[61] Rule 178(1) clarifies that when a requested State Party has more than one official language, it may indicate that requests for cooperation and any supporting documents can be drafted in any one of its official languages. In accordance with Rule 178(2), when the requested State has not chosen a language for communication with the Court, 'the request for cooperation shall either be in or be accompanied by a translation into one of the working languages of the Court'. The same principle applies pursuant to Rule 179, when a State that is not a party to the Statute has agreed to provide assistance to the Court under Article 87(5) and has not made a choice of language for such requests.

Article 87(3) imposes upon the requested State the obligation to 'keep confidential a request for cooperation and any documents supporting the request, except to the extent that the disclosure is necessary for execution of the request.'

On allocation of costs, Article 100 sets out the general rule that costs are borne by the requested State on whose territory a request is executed, unless expenses are of an extraordinary nature.[62]

[60] See infra note 77 and corresponding text. The related issue of whether the Court may enter into direct contact with individuals or must refer to national authorities is discussed in Ch. 42 below.

[61] Art. 87(2) continues as follows: 'Subsequent changes to this choice shall be made in accordance with the Rules of Procedure and Evidence'. Rule 180 provides that such changes 'shall be communicated in writing to the Registrar at the earliest opportunity' and 'shall take effect in respect of requests for cooperation made by the Court at a time agreed between the Court and the State or, in the absence of such an agreement, 45 days after the Court has received the communication and, in all cases, without prejudice to current requests or requests in progress'.

[62] Art. 100 contains an only apparently exhaustive list of what are to be considered as costs other than ordinary:

(a) Costs associated with the travel and security of witnesses and experts or the transfer under article 93 of persons in custody;
(b) Costs of translation, interpretation and transcription;
(c) Travel and subsistence costs of the judges, the Prosecutor, the Deputy Prosecutors, the Registrar, the Deputy Registrar and staff of any organ of the Court;
(d) Costs of any expert opinion or report requested by the Court;
(e) Costs associated with the transport of a person being surrendered to the Court by a custodial State; and
(f) Following consultation, any extraordinary costs that may result from the execution of a request.

These provisions also generally conform to inter-State practice, which typically provides for translation of requests into the language of the requested State, confidentiality of requests and their supporting documents (either upon a demand of the requesting State or independently of it) and reciprocal representation and payment of ordinary costs.

IV. Limits to the Obligation to Cooperate

While the ICC Statute does not envisage any ground for denying a request for arrest and surrender, three exceptions to the obligation to comply with requests by the Court for other forms of cooperation are expressly provided for: under Article 93(3), a State may refuse to execute a particular measure of assistance if execution of that measure is prohibited on the basis of an existing fundamental legal principle of general application and, after consultation with the Court, the matter cannot be resolved; pursuant to Article 72 and Article 93(4), a State may deny a request for assistance if the request concerns the production of documents or disclosure of evidence which relate to its national security interests; furthermore, with respect to a request by the Court for a type of assistance which is not specified under Article 93(1)(a)–(k), the obligation is limited to assistance 'which is not prohibited by the law of the requested State' (Article 93(1)(l) ).[63]

The question arises as to whether, outside the exceptions expressly provided for under the Statute, States are under an unconditional duty to execute requests by the Court, in the light of the general obligation to cooperate laid down in Article 86 and further restated in Articles 89 and 93 with regard to requests for arrest and surrender and other forms of cooperation, respectively.

With respect to conflicting provisions of national law, a well-known principle of international law prevents States from hiding behind their national law in order to evade their international obligations arising under the Statute.[64] Article 88, combined with Articles 89 and 93, makes it clear that there have to be procedures in place for all forms of cooperation specified under Part 9. Therefore, while national procedures have to be resorted to in order to comply with requests by the Court, they may not be used for justifying the refusal of a request. It follows that any prohibition or requirement provided for under domestic, statutory, or constitutional law is not a ground for refusal to comply with requests for cooperation or assistance by the Court. On the contrary, various provisions in the Statute specifically provide for a duty on the part of the requested State to advise and consult with the Court regarding any requirements under its national law that may apply to the execution of a request for surrender or for other forms of cooperation (Articles 91(4) and 96(3) ).

[64] See supra note 38 and corresponding text.

More complex issues arise with regard to the relationship between the obligation to cooperate with the Court under the Statute and inconsistent international obligations incumbent upon the requested State under both customary law and treaties vis-à-vis States not parties. One of the main consequences of the Court itself being established by means of a treaty is that, in principle, decisions of the Court do not prevail over a State's duty under treaty or customary law towards States which are not a party to the Statute.[65]

In this respect, the position of the Court under the Statute is markedly different from that of the ad hoc Tribunals established under Chapter VII of the UN Charter. Here lies the most fundamental difference between the duty of States to cooperate under the Statute and the duty to cooperate with the ad hoc Tribunals under their Statutes. Since the ad hoc Tribunals have been established pursuant to resolutions of the Security Council, decisions by the ICTY and the ICTR come within the provision of Article 103 of the UN Charter.[66] Thus the obligation for States to cooperate prevails over obligations States may have assumed under any other international agreement. This is not the case for the obligations arising out of the Rome Statute, except for what may occur in cases referred to the Court by the Security Council acting under Chapter VII of the Charter.

Some provisions of the Statute explicitly exempt the requested State from compliance with requests the execution of which would amount to a violation of its international obligations vis-à-vis States that are not parties to the Statute.

Under Articles 90 and 93(9)(a), relating to competing requests for the surrender of persons and for other forms of assistance, respectively, the requested State retains the final say in determining whether or not to execute a request by the Court which would make it act inconsistently with an existing international obligation to cooperate vis-à-vis a State that is not a party to the Statute.

Articles 73 and 93(9)(b) allow a State to refuse to provide documents or information disclosed to it in confidence by a third State or an international organization, if the consent to disclosure (which the requested State is under an obligation to seek) is refused by the originator.

Article 98 provides that the Court may not proceed with a request for cooperation which would require the requested State to act inconsistently with its obligations under international law or international agreements with respect to State or diplomatic immunity or otherwise agreed immunity of persons or property of a third State, unless the Court itself can first obtain the consent of the third State concerned. To this end, Rule 195 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence states that when the requested State notifies the Court that a request for surrender or assistance raises a problem of execution in respect of Article 98, 'the requested State shall provide any information relevant to assist the Court in the application of article 98. Any concerned third State or sending State may provide additional information to assist the Court.'

[65] For a general analysis of this issue, see supra note 3.

[66] Art. 103 of the UN Charter reads as follows: 'In the event of conflict between the obligations of the Members of the United Nations under the present Charter and their obligations under any other international agreement, their obligations under the present Charter shall prevail.'

Finally, in various provisions of the Statute, care has been taken to provide a consistent body of rules with regard to arrest and detention of persons by the requested State, thus reducing the possibility that the obligation for a State under the Statute to arrest and detain a person will conflict with its obligation under one or more human rights treaties to respect that person's liberty and security. Similarly, provisions on searches and seizures are cast so as to not prejudice the rights to property of persons affected by measures requested by the Court.

To some extent, the Rome Statute has thus anticipated the possibility of conflicting obligations and tried to find a solution to them. However, it is, of course, difficult to anticipate all conflicts that may arise.

Should the execution of a request by the Court be inconsistent with other international obligations previously undertaken by the requested State with respect to a State that is not a party to the Statute, it should be open to the State concerned to legitimately refuse to cooperate, subject only to the requirement of consultation with the Court to resolve the matter under Article 97. Article 97 of the Statute imposes on the requested State a general duty to consult with the Court in order to solve any problem which may impede or prevent the execution of a request. Among the problems impeding or preventing the execution of a request, Article 97(c) expressly mentions: 'The fact that execution of the request in its current form would require the requested State to breach a pre-existing treaty obligation undertaken with respect to another State.'

Article 97 recognizes that there may be situations of conflicting treaty obligations not anticipated by the Statute. In these situations, the solution may vary depending on whether or not the State whose rights would be infringed by the execution of a Court's request is itself a party to the Statute. That States parties 'shall consult with the Court without delay in order to resolve the matter' presumes a good faith effort on the part of both the Court and the State. However, the provision implies that a situation may arise in which a State Party could lawfully refuse a request for cooperation by the Court, where execution would inevitably infringe upon the rights of a State that is not a party to the Statute.

V. Remedies for Non-Compliance

Failure on the part of a State Party 'to comply with a request to co-operate by the Court contrary to the provisions of th[e] Statute, thereby preventing the Court from exercising its function and powers under th[e] Statute', empowers the Court to 'make a finding to that effect and refer the matter to the Assembly of States parties or, where the Security Council referred the matter to the Court, to the Security Council'. So provides Article 87(7), with regard to a State Party's failure to cooperate with the Court.

Article 87(5) deals with cases where a State, which is not a party to the Statute but is under an obligation to cooperate with the Court on the basis of an ad hoc arrangement, an agreement, or any other appropriate basis, fails to cooperate with requests by the Court. In such situations, 'the Court may so inform the Assembly of States parties or, where the Security Council referred the matter to the Court, the Security Council'. Although under this provision the Court is not expressly endowed with the power to make a finding, but may only 'inform' either the Assembly or the Security Council about the State's failure to cooperate, such a power may be deemed inherent to its judicial function. The reason for the difference in wording is the belief of some delegations that weaker language should be used with respect to States not parties to the Statute. It is not easy, though, to find a solid justification for a distinction in substance as the non-cooperating State infringes its obligations in both cases.[67]

Article 87(6) does not explicitly deal with the consequences of a failure of an intergovernmental organization to cooperate with the Court. Cooperation by an intergovernmental organization or arrangement is, in principle, a voluntary one. It is perfectly conceivable, however, that an intergovernmental organization, including a peacekeeping force, might assume an international treaty obligation to cooperate or be under a corresponding obligation because of a Security Council resolution under Chapter VII of the UN Charter. In any such cases, it would incur international responsibility in case of failure to cooperate, and the Court—it is submitted—would have the inherent power to make a finding as to the organization's failure to cooperate.[68]

A. The Practice of the ICTY

In the context of Article 29 of the ICTY Statute, the Appeals Chamber found, in its Blaškić Subpoena decision, that 'the International Tribunal is endowed with the inherent power to make a judicial finding concerning a State's failure to observe the provisions of the Statute or the Rules. It also has the power to report this judicial finding to the Security Council'. As to the first point, the Court stated: 'The power to make a judicial finding is an inherent power; the International Tribunal must possess the power to make all those judicial determinations that are necessary for the exercise of its primary jurisdiction. This inherent power inures to the benefit of the International Tribunal in order that its basic judicial function may be fully discharged and its judicial role safeguarded.'[69] With regard to the second point, the Court found that the International Tribunal's power to report to the Security Council derives from the relationship between the two organs, as a 'logical corollary' of the Tribunal having been established by a Security Council resolution pursuant to Chapter VII of the UN Charter.[70] In this respect, it added, the ICTY has no power to go beyond such a finding and the consequent referral to the Security Council: 'the finding by the International Tribunal must not include any recommendations or suggestions as to the course of action the Security Council may wish to take as a consequence of that finding.'[71] The Court went on further to qualify the obligation to cooperate with the International Tribunal set out in Article 29 of the Statute as an obligation erga omnes partes, in the fulfilment of which 'every member State of the United Nations has a legal interest'. Faced with a situation where a judicial finding by the International Tribunal of a breach of Article 29 has been reported to the Security Council, each Member State of the UN may act upon the legal interest referred to, either unilaterally or collectively. According to the Tribunal, in order 'to limit, as far as possible, the risks of arbitrariness and conflict', priority should be given to collective or joint action to be taken through an intergovernmental organization. This collective action may take various forms, 'such as a political or moral condemnation, or a collective request to cease the breach, or economic or diplomatic sanctions'. 'In addition'—according to the Tribunal—'collective action would be warranted in the case of repeated and blatant breaches of Article 29 by the same State; and provided the Security Council had not decided that it enjoyed exclusive powers on the matter, the situation being part of a general condition of threat to the peace.'[72]

[69] Ap. Ch., Judgment of 29 October 1997, Blaškić, supra note 5, para. 33.

[70] Accordingly, the Appeals Chamber found 'as falling within the authority of the International Tribunal' the adoption of Rules 7*bis*, 11, 13, 59(b), and 61(e) of the ICTY Rules of Procedure and Evidence, which all provide for direct notification to the Security Council where a State fails to cooperate. Ap. Ch., Judgment of 29 October 1997, Blaškić, supra, note 5, para. 34. See ibid., notes 47 and 48, for a list of cases in which the President of the Tribunal has referred to the Security Council a failure by a State or an Entity to comply with Art. 29 and the follow-up given by the Security Council, normally a statement made, on behalf of the whole body, by the President of the Security Council and addressed to the non-cooperating State or Entity. May et al. (eds.), Essays on ICTY Procedure and Evidence in Honour of Gabrielle Kirk McDonald (2001) 421 and the corresponding provisions (identical in their wording) in the ICTR Rules of Procedure and Evidence.

B. The ICC Statute and the General Rules on State Responsibility

With respect to the consequences of a failure to cooperate with the ICC, the Statutes provides for the means endorsed by the ICTY in the Appeals Chamber Blaškić Subpoena decision.

Where the Security Council acting under Chapter VII of the UN Charter refers the matter to the Court pursuant to Article 13(b) of the Statute, the Court may refer a State's failure to cooperate to the Security Council. In such a case, the Security Council will proceed in accordance with its competences under the UN Charter. The Council may, for instance, consider the appropriateness of the adoption of measures against the responsible State.

In all other cases, the Court may inform the Assembly of States Parties. Pursuant to Article 112(2)(f), the Assembly of States Parties may consider 'any question relating to non-cooperation'. Article 112(2)(f), however, does not state which options are open to this body. Reference must then be made to the general rules on State responsibility. Thus, the Assembly of States Parties would be entitled to ask for the immediate cessation of the international wrongful act and arguably also consider the appropriateness of collective countermeasures, such as economic sanctions, against the non-cooperating State.[73]

Also in cases where the matter was not previously referred by it to the Court, the Security Council could act under Chapter VII of the UN Charter, whenever the State's failure to cooperate with the Court amounted to a threat to international peace or security or a breach thereof.[74] The silence of the Statute, however, leaves the question open as to how action by the Security Council would be coordinated with that of the Assembly of States Parties.

Failing any action either taken or recommended by the Assembly of States Parties or the Security Council, States Parties to the Statute or any Member State of the United Nations, as the case may be, may resort to remedies generally available to them under international law, with a view to ensuring compliance with requests for cooperation by the Court. The Assembly of States Parties and the Security Council do not appear to enjoy exclusive powers on the matter under the Statute.[75] Furthermore, the Statute only addresses a characterized infringement of the obligation to cooperate by a State Party, namely one which prevents the Court

[74] See A. Cassese, 'The Statute of the International Criminal Court: Some Preliminary Reflections', 10 EJIL (1999) 144, at 166: 'Of course this possibility is not excluded by the ICC Statute, but it also would have been a good idea expressly to include it' (emphasis in the original).

[75] This view is shared by Kress, supra note 14, at 450: 'The questions of State responsibility are not really answered so that it appears impossible to qualify the Statute as a self-contained regime.'

Scanned by CamScanner

from carrying out its functions.[76] After the Court finds that a characterized infringement has occurred, any State Party should have the right to resort to countermeasures, should the Assembly of States Parties or the Security Council fail to take action. The question of remedies for minor infringements of the obligation to cooperate with the Court, which are not dealt with in the Statute, arguably remains entirely subject to the general rules on State responsibility, subject only to the specific dispute-settlement mechanism provided for under Article 119. Also with respect to such violations, however, the Court would be vested with an exclusive power of finding whether an infringement has taken place. In both cases, the erga omnes partes character of the obligation to cooperate with the ICC entails that any reaction albeit not channelled through the Assembly of States Parties or the Security Council should be taken by States in cooperation. This would not exclude, however, the adoption, as a last resort, of individual countermeasures.

VI. Concluding Remarks

As the foregoing analysis has shown, the general legal framework of the cooperation regime established under the Statute appears to follow treaty-based mechanisms for judicial assistance in criminal matters in inter-State relations.

Unless there is an obligation imposed by the Security Council acting under Chapter VII of the UN Charter, the obligation to cooperate with the Court derives its binding force from the Statute qua an international treaty. Therefore the Court's power to issue a binding request for cooperation or assistance needs in principle to be based on the Statute. However, two basic differences between the system of cooperation which is provided by the Statute and traditional inter-State cooperation need to be emphasized.

First, the obligation to cooperate with the Court, unlike obligations to cooperate provided for under most bilateral and multilateral treaties, appears to be cast in very stringent if not absolute terms. In this respect the position of States and international organizations which come under an obligation to cooperate with the Court is very similar to the position of these same subjects vis-à-vis the two ad hoc Tribunals.

The other, and perhaps most fundamental, difference is that extradition and mutual legal assistance treaties are generally intended to establish optional, not exclusive, procedures for obtaining the custody of persons or taking evidence abroad,[77] while the modalities of cooperation specified in the relevant provisions of the Statute set out the only procedures available to the Court in order to carry out its functions.

[76] For a different view see, Kress and Prost, supra note 37, at 1067, expressing doubts as to the usefulness of the condition that the Court makes a finding. According to these authors, '[i]n any event the condition will normally be fulfilled as it is very hard to think of a case where the non-cooperation would not prevent the Court from exercising its functions and powers'.

[77] The issue of the exclusive or optional character of inter-States cooperation procedures provided for under international treaties has been amply discussed with respect to extradition treaties. Cf. e.g. United States v. Alvarez Machain, 15 June 1992, 504 US (1992) 655, in which the US Supreme Court held that the respondent's forcible abduction from Mexico—although it might be in violation of general international principles—was not in violation of the extradition treaty between the United States and Mexico. On the debate following thereof, see e.g. M. Abbell, 'The Need for U.S. Legislation to Curb State Sponsored Kidnapping', in R. D. Atkins (ed.), The Alleged Transnational Criminal Law (1993) 87. As to mutual legal assistance treaties, the issue was first discussed by the US Supreme Court in the well known Aerospatiale case, with reference to the Hague Convention on the Taking of Evidence Abroad in Civil and Commercial Matters of 1970. The Court held that '[t]he Convention does not provide exclusive or mandatory procedures for obtaining documents and information located in a foreign signatory's territory. The Convention's plain language, as well as the history of its proposal and ratification by the United States, unambiguously supports the conclusion that it was intended to establish optional procedures for obtaining evidence abroad. Its preamble speaks in non-mandatory terms, specifying its purpose to "facilitate" discovery and to "improve mutual judicial co-operation". Similarly, its text uses permissive language, and does not expressly modify the law of contracting States or require them to use the specified procedure or change their own procedure. The Convention does not deprive the District Court of its jurisdiction to order, under the Federal Rules, a foreign national party to produce evidence physically located within a signatory nation.' Societé Nationale Industrielle Aerospatiale et al. v. US District Court for the Southern District of Iowa, 15 June 1987, 482 US (1987) 522. This issue is but one aspect of the much larger debate over extraterritorial application of both procedural and substantial, national laws, particularly between the USA and Western European Countries. Nadelmann, 'The Role of the United States in the International Enforcement of Criminal Law', 31 Harvard International Law Journal (1990) 37; C. L. Blaskesly and O. ## I. Introduction

Part 9 of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court is concerned with international cooperation and judicial assistance. A number of articles in this part of the Statute are devoted to the arrest and surrender by States of persons who are under suspicion of having committed crimes over which the International (p. 1640) Criminal Court has jurisdiction or who have been convicted for such crimes by the Court.

The surrender of suspects and accused to the International Criminal Court is of vital importance to its proper functioning. The duty of States to arrest and surrender persons whose presence before the Court is needed is one of the corner-stones on which the Rome Statute rests. Historical precedents make the fundamental nature of the duty to arrest and surrender abundantly clear. Attempts to create an international system for the adjudication of war crimes and other international crimes in the aftermath of World War I have largely failed because surrender of persons could not be secured. On the other hand, the successes of the International Military Tribunals of Nuremberg and Tokyo and of other tribunals erected after World War II would not have been possible without the operation of a smooth system for arresting and surrendering the accused. In the last few years, the world witnessed the activities of two ad hoc international criminal tribunals created by the Security Council of the United Nations. The continuous and precarious struggle of the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia in obtaining the presence of accused persons is well known. A closer look at these historical precedents may, therefore, help in assessing the strengths and weaknesses of the system created in the Rome Statute with regard to surrender.

Any study of the provisions of the Rome Statute with regard to arrest and surrender will immediately reveal one characteristic. It is clear that these provisions have been strongly influenced by the examples of both ad hoc international criminal tribunals and that lessons have been drawn from their experiences. On the other hand, there is much in them that reminds one of traditional features of extradition law. In a sense, the system of the Rome Statute is a compromise between traditional extradition law and the 'new law' of the ad hoc Tribunals. It is, therefore, worthwhile to study the elements of the compromise first by paying separate attention to the 'old' and the 'new' before embarking upon a commentary of the Statute itself.

In the following, I will first pay attention to the historical precedents of World War I and II. I will then discuss extradition for international crimes between States and transfer of suspects and accused to the ad hoc Tribunals. Finally, the provisions of the Rome Statute will be analysed.

(p. 1641) II. Surrender for International Crimes in the Aftermath of World Wars I and II

A. World War I[1]

As Bierzanek has remarked, World War I marked a new phase in the historical development of criminal responsibility for war crimes.[2] While, in the past, peace treaties ending international armed conflicts usually contained provisions granting amnesty to those suspected of having violated the laws and customs of war, public opinion in France, the United Kingdom, and other countries made a similar solution with regard to war crimes and other crimes committed in the course of World War I impossible. The Allied and Associated Powers, therefore, included provisions in the peace treaties they wanted to conclude with Austria, Bulgaria, Germany, Hungary, and Turkey aimed at bringing to justice such persons before courts of the victorious powers or before courts especially established by them for the occasion. An integral part of these provisions was the duty of the vanquished powers to hand over persons accused of having committed international crimes.

Penal provisions on the trial and surrender of persons accused of having committed international crimes were included in the peace treaties with Austria, Bulgaria, Germany, Hungary, and Turkey.[3] With the exception of the peace treaty with Turkey these provisions applied to violations of the laws and customs of war only and did not also envisage violations of the laws of humanity.[4] In them, the vanquished powers recognized the right of the Allied and Associated Powers to bring before military tribunals persons accused of having committed acts in violation of the laws and customs of war and assumed the duty to provide assistance in the investigation and trial of these persons, by handing them over on request and by other means. Of the five peace treaties, the treaty with Germany is the only one to include also provisions with regard to acts which provoked the world war and accompanied its inception. Article 227 of the Treaty of Versailles provided for the arraignment of the former German Emperor William II for 'a supreme offence (p. 1642) against international morality and the sanctity of treaties'. It envisaged the creation of a special tribunal that would have to try him and, in doing so, would be guided by the highest motives of international policy with a view to vindicating the solemn obligations of international undertakings and the validity of international morality. This tribunal would have to fix the punishment which it would consider to be appropriate. Finally, Article 227 provided that a request for the surrender of the ex-Emperor would be addressed to The Netherlands, where William II had found refuge in the meantime.

The history of the implementation of Articles 227–230 of the Treaty of Versailles is well documented. During the negotiations of these provisions as well as afterwards the German government and large sections of the German public, for a variety of reasons, strongly resisted the idea of surrender of German nationals with a view to their trial by foreign tribunals.[5] As an alternative Germany advanced the possibility of trying them before German courts. A special statute was even enacted for that purpose in December 1919. Meanwhile, in February 1920, a month after the Versailles Treaty entered into force, the Allied and Associated Powers presented Germany with a list of almost 900 persons to be surrendered to them. This list, which was published by the German government, comprised many of the highest politicians and members of the military. Feeling politically unable to comply with the request the German government proposed to bring the accused persons to trial before the Supreme Court in Leipzig. This proposal was eventually accepted by the Allied and Associated Powers in May 1920. They presented to Germany a new provisional list comprising 45 names, accompanied with the warning that they reserved the right to institute criminal proceedings themselves if the results of the German efforts would appear to be unsatisfactory. The Leipzig trials took place in 1921 and 1922. Of a total of 901 cases brought before the German Supreme Court on the basis of requests by the Allied and Associated Powers, thirteen cases ended in a conviction; 888 accused were acquitted or summarily dismissed.[6] While, in August 1922, the Allied and Associated Powers expressed their dissatisfaction with these results, they refrained from taking further action against Germany. In Belgium and France a number of trials in absentia were conducted afterwards.

In January 1920 the Allied and Associated Powers addressed a request based on Article 227 of the Versailles Treaty to The Netherlands for the surrender of William II. The Netherlands, which had remained neutral during World War I and had not become a Party to the Treaty, refused to satisfy the request. In doing (p. 1643) so the Dutch government invoked principles of national constitutional law as well as a secular tradition of granting asylum. A second request, made in February 1920, was equally unsuccessful.[7] Given the fact that the former Article 4 of the Dutch Constitution permitted extradition on the basis of a treaty only, that the acts alleged did not constitute criminal offences according to Dutch law or to extradition treaties concluded with the Allied and Associated Powers, and that the Constitution did not permit the conclusion of an extradition treaty for the surrender of one person only, it is hard to see that the Dutch government could have reacted in a different way.

Little to nothing is known about the implementation of the penal provisions in the peace treaties with Austria, Bulgaria, and Hungary. As far as the peace treaty with Turkey is concerned, it did not enter into force and was later replaced by the Treaty of Lausanne, concluded in 1923. That Treaty did not contain any provisions with regard to war crimes and violations of the laws of humanity. It was accompanied by a Declaration of Amnesty for all offences committed between 1 August 1914 and 20 November 1922.

It is generally held that the attempts to punish the war criminals of World War I in accordance with the provisions of the peace treaties ended in failure.[8] As for the reasons why the Treaty of Versailles was not enforced, the United Nations War Crimes Commission has noted that the sanctions came too late, when public opinion no longer demanded them, that the Allies were no longer united when the war was over, that the world in 1919–1920 was not internationally mature enough to understand the consequences of a failure to ensure respect of the provisions of the Treaty, and that Articles 228–230 were hastily and imperfectly framed, so that it would have been impossible to carry them out.[9] Meanwhile, the experiences with the peace treaties exerted a considerable influence on the system of repression of international crimes committed during World War II.

B. World War II[10]

Already from an early date during World War II, Allied governments continually expressed their resolve to prosecute and punish persons guilty of war crimes and (p. 1644) other international crimes. Declarations to that effect by the American, British, and Soviet governments, made in the autumn of 1941, were followed by the Declaration of Saint James's Palace, signed in London by the governments of nine occupied countries on 13 January 1942. In it, the governments placed 'among their principal war aims the punishment, through the channel of organised justice, of those guilty of or responsible for' war crimes. They announced their resolve 'to see to it in a spirit of international solidarity that (a) those guilty of or responsible, whatever their nationality, are sought out, handed over to justice and judged, (b) that the sentences pronounced are carried out'. Moreover, they declared that the acts envisaged had nothing in common with 'the conceptions of an act of war or of a political crime as understood by civilised nations'. In July 1943, the governments of the United Kingdom, the United States, and the Soviet Union forwarded communications to a number of neutral States to the effect that these States should refrain from granting asylum to persons guilty of war crimes committed in Italy or elsewhere. Of all the declarations made during World War II with regard to the surrender of persons suspected of international crimes, the most important one is the Moscow Declaration of 1 November 1943. In it, the governments of the United States, the United Kingdom, and the Soviet Union, speaking 'in the interest of the thirty-two United Nations', warned Germany that all those guilty of having committed atrocities, massacres, and executions would 'be sent back to the countries in which their abominable deeds were done in order that they may be judged and punished according to the laws of these liberated countries'. The Declaration was to be 'without prejudice to the case of the major criminals whose offences have no particular geographical location and who will be punished by a joint decision of the Governments of the Allies'. That decision was adopted in the London Agreement of 8 August 1945, establishing an International Military Tribunal for the trial of the major war criminals of the European Axis. Thus, the Moscow Declaration set the pattern that was followed after World War II for the prosecution and punishment of those suspected of having committed international crimes.

During World War II, the Allies, apart from warning enemy States of their intention to prosecute and punish persons guilty of war crimes and other international crimes, also took specific measures to prepare an (international) system of repression. An important step in this regard was the establishment of the United Nations War Crimes Commission in October 1943. Of the many activities carried out by the Commission between 1943 and 1947 those with regard to the apprehension and surrender of persons suspected of having committed war crimes and other international crimes should be mentioned here. During World War II, the Commission prepared a Draft Convention for the surrender of war criminals, which was based on the conviction that the rules and machinery for surrendering them should be fundamentally different from those of traditional (p. 1645) extradition law. The Draft Convention was limited to the surrender of persons between Allied Nations; it was not regarded as wise to attempt to obtain adherence of neutrals. As far as enemy States were concerned, in the opinion of the Commission their obligations to surrender persons would have to be settled in armistice and/or peace treaties; draft articles were drawn up for that purpose. The procedure for surrendering persons would be an administrative one and the conditions for applying for and obtaining surrender reduced to a minimum. However, in April 1945 the British government rejected the proposal. In their view, the powers they possessed were sufficient to enable this matter to be dealt with rapidly and satisfactorily by executive action, provided that it was kept on an informal basis and not made the subject of a formal treaty. The other Allied governments followed suit. They all established an informal machinery for surrendering persons by executive action.[11] Another important activity of the Commission to be mentioned here was the preparation of lists of persons suspected of having committed international crimes. These lists often served as a basis for the surrender of persons between governments.[12]

World War II came to an end with the conclusion of a series of armistice agreements and declarations of surrender between the victorious and the vanquished States, almost all of them including explicit provisions on the apprehension and surrender of persons accused of war crimes. Similar provisions, extending the obligation to surrender persons to those accused of having committed crimes against peace and crimes against humanity, can be found in the peace treaties signed in 1947 with Bulgaria, Finland, Hungary, Italy, and Roumenia.[13] Moreover, the Allied governments set up administrative procedures for the mutual surrender of wanted persons in order to implement the Moscow Declaration. The most important instrument in this regard was the Allied Control Council Law No. 10, which was issued by the Allied Control Council for Germany on 29 December 1945, and remained in force until 1956.[14] For a certain period, this network of instruments seems, on the whole, to have functioned well. Rather soon, however, the Cold War virtually brought an end to surrender between the Western and the Eastern European States, while, after 1950, the whole system of administrative surrender seems to have fallen into decay.[15]

(p. 1646) During World War II as well as afterwards, the Allied Governments gave several warnings to neutral countries that no refuge should be given to war criminals. However, they refrained from negotiating specific instruments with these States for the surrender of persons accused of international crimes. Their (sporadic) efforts in the years following World War II to obtain the extradition or expulsion of such persons generally met with very little success.[16]

Finally, the involvement of the United Nations in the matter of surrender should be mentioned here. On 13

February 1946, the General Assembly of the United Nations unanimously adopted Resolution 3(I).[17] Using the language of the Moscow Declaration, the Resolution recommended the Member States of the United Nations to take all necessary measures to arrest and send back war criminals to the countries in which their abominable deeds were done. Moreover, it called upon other States to take all necessary measures for the apprehension of such criminals with a view to their immediate removal to the countries in which they had committed their crimes. A year later, the matter came back before the General Assembly due to charges made by Yugoslavia to the effect that certain Member States and candidate Member States were not surrendering war criminals in conformity with Resolution 3(I). At the end of the debate a new resolution was adopted. Resolution 170(II) of 31 October 1947 reaffirmed the earlier resolution.[18] However, it made two important additional points. First, it recommended that Member States support their request for surrender with sufficient evidence to establish that 'a reasonable prima facie case exists as to identity and guilt' of the persons requested. Secondly, it stated that 'trials of war criminals, like all other trials, should be governed by the principles of justice, law and evidence'.[19]

In retrospect, two general observations can be made with regard to the developments during and shortly after World War II. The first is that the Allied Nations drew a number of lessons from the experiences of some of them after World War (p. 1647) I. They made their intention to bring to justice the perpetrators of international crimes perfectly clear to their enemies already during the war, they took specific steps to implement their plans in the meantime and they concluded armistice agreements and surrender declarations which obligated their enemies to hand over to them persons accused of having committed international crimes. However, all this does not sufficiently explain why they succeeded after 1945 where they had failed after 1918. The decisive difference seems to be that World War II, unlike World War I, ended with the Allied Nations occupying the territories of their enemies and thus being able to impose their will on them without too many difficulties.

The second observation relates to the fact that the system for surrendering perpetrators of international crimes created by the Allied Nations was short-lived. It did not develop into a more general system designed to cope with future needs arising from future conflicts. It is especially important to note here that, in the first decade following World War II, no proposals to create such a system were debated within the framework of the United Nations. Undoubtedly, this was mainly due to the fact that, in the same period, no progress could be made with regard to the adoption of an International Criminal Code and the establishment of an International Criminal Court. Instead, for some forty years the development of a more general system for surrendering persons accused of international crimes became a slow and unsystematic process which yielded piecemeal results.

III. Extradition for International Crimes in National and International Law

In the years after 1945, the problem of whether and to what extent States were prepared and obligated to extradite persons accused of having committed the crimes now mentioned in the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (genocide, other crimes against humanity including the crime of apartheid, war crimes, and the crime of aggression) attracted much attention. Important developments took place over the next forty to forty-five years. The same is true with regard to the problem of what could be the consequences of a refusal to extradite or of extradition not occurring for another reason. A discussion of these problems should include the crime of torture. Although torture is not mentioned in the Statute as a separate international crime and, consequently, the International Criminal Court has jurisdiction over torture only in a situation in which torture amounts to genocide, a crime against humanity, or a war crime, international developments with regard to the prohibition of torture may nevertheless shed light on those with regard to the crimes mentioned in the Statute. On the other hand, there is hardly any need to pay separate attention to the crime of aggression, the (p. 1648) simple reason being that virtually no relevant developments seem to have taken place here at all. There are no reported cases on extradition for aggression; more-over, it seems that most States have not criminalized aggression in their penal laws.[20]

A. Extradition

1. The Political Offence Exception

The first question to be discussed in the matter of extradition is whether the crimes mentioned in the Rome Statute may be regarded as political offences for which extradition may or will be refused.[21]

The idea that war crimes should not be considered political offences for the purpose of extradition is not of recent times.[22] Nevertheless, in the first ten to fifteen years after 1945, extradition of war criminals was refused regularly, although usually not for the reason that their acts qualified as political offences.[23] Cases in which national courts attached a political character to war crimes or other international crimes remained rare.[24] The most important example is Karadzole v. Artukovic, decided by the United States Court of Appeals in 1957. In it, the Court upheld the decision of a District Court which had assumed that ordering the death of 1,293 named persons and a much higher number of unnamed persons amounted to political offences because they were committed at the time of a political uprising, the fight for political supremacy in wartime Croatia. The Court of Appeals first equated crimes against humanity with war crimes and then held that post-war developments within the United Nations with regard to the surrender of alleged war criminals did not carry sufficient weight to modify long-standing (p. 1649) judicial interpretation of provisions in extradition treaties relating to political offences, in this case the Treaty with Yugoslavia.[25]

Starting from the 1960s, national courts in a number of countries have become increasingly resolute and explicit in denying, for the purpose of extradition or of other forms of assistance in criminal matters, a political character to war crimes and other international crimes mentioned in the Rome Statute. One of the first examples is provided by the Kroeger case, decided by the Swiss Supreme Court in 1966.[26] Applying its long developed predominance test to war crimes and crimes against humanity, it concluded that the killing of communists, Jews, and inmates of mental institutions in the Ukraine during World War II could not constitute political offences according to Swiss law. In the same year, the Court of Appeal of Accra, Ghana, rendered a similar decision in The State v. Schumann, a case involving the killing of Jews and mental patients in a concentration camp.[27] Finally, in 1968 the Argentinian Supreme Court held that the political offence exception should not be applied in the case of offences amounting to cruel or immoral acts which shock the conscience of civilized people.[28] In later years, courts in other States took the same direction. Of special importance in this regard is the case law of courts in the United States. In 1986, a renewed Yugoslavian request for the extradition of Artukovic met with more success. This time, a district court granted his extradition.[29] Its decision was subsequently affirmed by the United States Court of Appeals.[30] Another well known case, in which a political character was denied to crimes against humanity, is that of Demjanjuk.[31] British and Australian State practice provide examples of the granting of other forms of legal assistance in cases in which the requesting State was carrying out investigations into war crimes or crimes against humanity.[32] Finally, one has to bear in mind that in most other States, the general criteria in national law for determining whether or not an offence is a political offence virtually preclude the person requested from invoking the political offence exception with any chance of success where war crimes, crimes against humanity, and genocide are concerned. This may explain (p. 1650) why, in some cases, persons whose extradition was requested for such crimes did not even attempt to argue that their acts had a political character.[33]

In addition to developments at a national level there have been international developments. The first international instrument to be discussed here is the 1948 UN Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide. Article VII of the Convention provides that genocide and other acts enumerated in Article III shall not be considered as political crimes for the purpose of extradition. On the other hand, the absence of a similar provision in the four 1949 Geneva Conventions is striking. Article III of the 1968 UN Convention on the Non-Applicability of Statutory Limitations to War Crimes and Crimes against Humanity provides that States Parties undertake to adopt all necessary domestic measures with a view to making possible extradition, 'in accordance with international law', of the persons to which the Convention refers. It has been stated that this provision obligates States Parties not to refuse extradition on the basis of political offence exceptions, unless the human rights of the person requested would be seriously jeopardized by extraditing him to the requesting State.[34] More straightforward is the 1975 Additional Protocol to the European Convention on Extradition. Article 1 of the Protocol excludes three different categories of offences from the political offence exception in the 1957 Convention. The first and second categories relate to genocide as defined by the Genocide Convention and to the grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions. The third category has regard to any comparable violations of the laws of war having effect at the time when the Protocol enters into force and of customs of war existing at that time, which are nor already provided for in the provisions of the Geneva Conventions with regard to grave breaches. This covers violations of the 1899 and 1907 Hague Conventions but also violations of customary humanitarian law in armed conflict insofar as they entail individual criminal responsibility.[35] The last relevant multilateral convention is the 1973 UN Convention on the Suppression and Punishment of the Crime of Apartheid. Article XI of the Convention repeats the formula of Article VII of the Genocide Convention with regard to the crime of apartheid. Finally, a series of four resolutions concerning the punishment of war criminals and persons committing crimes against humanity, adopted by the General Assembly of the United Nations during the years 1969–1973, should be mentioned here.[36]

(p. 1651) Although none of these resolutions explicitly rejects the use of the political offence exception where extradition for war crimes and crimes against humanity is concerned, they all, in one way or another, emphasize the duty of Member States of the United Nations under the Charter and generally recognized norms of international law to cooperate with each other in arresting and bringing to trial persons suspected of having committed such crimes.[37]

The developments discussed here show an ever stronger tendency to exclude international crimes such as war crimes and crimes against humanity from the political offence exception. Recently, Gilbert has concluded that there is a developing customary international law norm to the effect that war crimes and crimes against humanity are not to be regarded as political offences.[38] In an obiter dictum in Prosecutor v. Anto Furundžija, the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia expressed the same opinion more forcefully with regard to the crime of torture. It held that torture is prohibited by a peremptory norm of international law and discussed the various consequences of the prohibition of torture having acquired the status of jus cogens. In its view, one of the consequences is that torture 'must not be excluded from extradition under any political offence exemption'.[39] What is true for torture must a fortiori be true for aggression, war crimes, and crimes against humanity.

One cannot but agree in principle with the point of view that the political offence exception should not be applied to aggression, war crimes, and crimes against humanity. Since these crimes are crimes under general international law and since all States are guardians of the international legal order, States have a shared interest in and a shared responsibility for their suppression. As a consequence, the two main traditional justifications for the political offence exception are irrelevant where aggression, war crimes, and crimes against humanity are concerned. The wish to stay aloof from political conflicts in other States and to avoid getting involved in them by extraditing political offenders cannot serve as a justification for not extraditing a person who is suspected of a crime that affects the international community as a whole. Equally, the idea that political offences need not always be morally reprehensible but may be justified by circumstances, the second (p. 1652) traditional justification for the exception, cannot be applied to aggression, war crimes, and crimes against humanity.

At first sight, matters seem to be different where the third traditional justification is concerned, the wish to protect political offenders against unfair justice or against other violations of their basic individual rights in the requesting State. That concern remains as valid as it has always been. It is even true that one of the main developments in extradition law during the past two decades, both at a national and at an international level, consists in the increasing concern of national and international judicial bodies with protecting individual persons against infringements of their basic human rights which could result from their being extradited or deported to another State. The judgments of the European Court of Human Rights in the cases of Soering v. the United Kingdom and Chahal v. the United Kingdom are but among the most striking examples of that development.[40] In Chahal, a deportation case, the Court held that the European Convention prohibits in absolute terms torture or inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment, irrespective of the victim's conduct. Thus, alleged offenders of crimes under general international law are no less entitled to protection of their basic rights than other persons whose extradition is requested. However, there is now no longer a need to use the political offence exception for that purpose. If a person needs protection, that protection can now be given by applying more modern escape clauses in extradition laws or extradition treaties with regard to the protection of human rights, by applying human rights conventions directly within the framework of extradition proceedings, or even by having recourse to jus cogens in the field of human rights.

2. Other Impediments to Extradition

War crimes and crimes against humanity are crimes under general international law. Their prohibition has acquired the status of jus cogens. Apart from entailing that the political offence should not be applied to them, this may, or should, also have a number of other consequences for extradition law that will be briefly discussed here.

A cornerstone of extradition law is the requirement of double criminality. The rule of double criminality requires that the conduct with regard to which extradition is requested constitute criminal offences according to the laws of both the requesting and the requested States. Where crimes under general international law are concerned, this requirement should not be rigorously maintained. Rather than asking the question whether the acts to which an extradition request relates may be considered to be offences under its national laws, the requested State should ask whether they constitute criminal offences under customary inter(p. 1653) national law. This is especially important where crimes against humanity are concerned, since many States have not introduced legislation making crimes against humanity separate offences under national law.

The jus cogens character of the prohibition of war crimes and crimes against humanity would seem to influence the operation of the double criminality requirement in yet another way: its time dimension. In examining whether the conduct with regard to which extradition has been requested constitutes a criminal offence according to the law of the requested State, many States consider the date of the extradition request or the decision on that request to be the relevant date. Other States require that the acts constitute criminal offences according to their law at the time of their commission. A recent example of the latter approach is provided by the judgment of the House of Lords of 24 March 1999, in Regina v. Bartle and the Commissioner of Police for the Metropolis and Others Ex Parte Pinochet.[41] This approach caused the House of Lords to exclude Pinochet's extradition with regard to twenty-two out of twenty-five charges of torture, the reason being that they related to conduct prior to the date on which the Criminal Justice Act 1988, implementing the 1984 UN Torture Convention, entered into force and torture became an extraterritorial criminal offence in the United Kingdom. Since the Lords recognized the jus cogens character of the prohibition of torture, a more appropriate approach would have been to attach decisive value to the approximate date on which torture became a crime under general international law, a date which at least one of the Law Lords placed in the early 1970s. Where individual criminal responsibility for certain conduct directly derives from customary international law without depending on national laws, the only question that seems to matter within the framework of extradition is whether or not that conduct occurred before or after the date it became a crime under general international law.[42] The question of whether the conduct constitutes a crime according to the law of the requested State at the time of its commission should not be of importance with regard to war crimes and crimes against humanity. The double criminality requirement is a means of ensuring reciprocity as well as protecting the person requested against punishment for conduct that has not been criminalized by the requested State; both considerations seem to be irrelevant in the case of international crimes. It can be argued that the same is true where criminalization of internationally prohibited conduct in the requesting State is concerned, since it is also a principle of customary international law with regard to crimes under general international law that the defence that the conduct did, at the time of its (p. 1654) commission, not constitute a criminal offence according to the law of that State is not a valid defence.

Similar questions arise where national statutes of limitation according to the law of the requested State are concerned. Assuming that customary international law entails that national statutes of limitations cannot be applied to crimes under general international law,[43] these statutes should lose any relevance within the framework of extradition law too. Following this line of reasoning, the Argentinian Supreme Court decided in 1995 to allow the extradition of Priebke to Italy on charges of crimes against humanity although, at the moment of its decision, Argentinian law still applied statutes of limitation to crimes against humanity.[44]

Finally, international immunities should be briefly discussed. There is an obvious tension between, on the one hand, traditional immunities of diplomatic and other persons under international law and the principle that the official position of an individual who commits a crime under general international law does not relieve him of criminal responsibility, on the other hand. That tension was the central issue in Regina v. Bartle and the Commissioner of Police for the Metropolis and Others Ex Parte Pinochet.[45] The House of Lords held that Pinochet could not claim immunity ratione materiae from arrest for extradition purposes in his capacity as a former Head of State. On the other hand, it also held that immunity ratione personae protects diplomatic agents and serving heads of State from such measures.

B. Deportation, Expulsion, and Abduction

As has been mentioned already in the discussion of the political offence exception, a number of international instruments preclude the granting of asylum to the perpetrators of aggression, war crimes, and crimes against humanity. One may add that, in State practice, deportation, sometimes preceded by denaturalization, and expulsion have always fulfilled an additional role in securing the return of persons suspected of having committed war crimes or crimes against humanity to States that wanted to prosecute them.[46] Sometimes, the propriety of these methods became a matter of controversy, the best-known examples being the denaturalization of (p. 1655) Demjanjuk by the United States[47] and the deportation of Barbie by Bolivia.[48] As far as abduction is concerned one should, of course, mention the kidnapping of Adolf Eichmann in Argentina and his transfer to Israel, presumably by Israeli government officials. In that case, the Israel Supreme Court later held that the events did not prevent Israel from exercising criminal jurisdiction over him,[49] while Argentina and Israel settled the dispute between them after United Nations Security Council Resolution of 23 June 1960 had requested Israel to make appropriate reparation.[50]

C. The Duty to Extradite or Prosecute

The most fundamental questions to be asked are whether and to what extent there exists a duty for States under international law to extradite alleged perpetrators of international crimes and whether there is an alternative duty for them to prosecute such persons before their own courts if, for whatever reasons, extradition does not take place. The answers to these questions are of considerable importance where the International Criminal Court is concerned, since they may influence the relationships between the Court and States that did not become Parties to its Statute.

1. The Duty to Extradite

A number of treaties and other texts with regard to war crimes and crimes against humanity contain provisions on the duty of States to extradite persons suspected of having committed these crimes. One may distinguish two categories here. On the one hand, there are texts focusing on the duty of States to extradite. On the other, there are texts that leave States free in the decision on whether or not to extradite but that attach to refusal of extradition the consequence that the State refusing extradition is obligated to itself prosecute the person requested. Some texts belong to both categories.

The oldest treaty belonging to the first class of texts is the UN Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide. Article VII, second paragraph, provides that the Parties to the Convention shall grant extradition to each other in accordance with their laws and treaties in force. Apparently, this provision (p. 1656) does not impose on the Contracting Parties more obligations than they had already assumed under other international instruments or will assume at a later date.[51] The same can be said of Article XI, second paragraph, of the UN Convention on the Suppression and Punishment of the Crime of Apartheid, which repeats the language of the Genocide Convention. More interesting and perhaps more important is Article III of the UN Convention on the Non-Applicability of Statutory Limitations to War Crimes and Crimes against Humanity. According to that provision, States Parties 'undertake to adopt all necessary domestic measures, legislative or otherwise, with a view to making possible the extradition, in accordance with international law, of the persons' referred to in the Convention.[52] Another treaty to be mentioned here is the 1984 UN Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment. Article 8 of the Convention stipulates that the offences envisaged shall be deemed to be included as extraditable offences in existing extradition treaties, that States which make extradition conditional on the existence of a treaty may consider the Convention as the legal basis for extradition, and that States which do not make extradition conditional on the existence of a treaty shall recognize the offences envisaged as extraditable offences between themselves subject to the conditions provided by the law of the requested State. Article 18 of the 1999 Second Protocol to the Hague Convention of 1954 for the Protection of Cultural Property in the Event of Armed Conflict and Article 10 of the International Law Commission's 1996 Draft Code of Crimes against the Peace and Security of Mankind copy the Torture Convention in these respects.

The four 1949 Geneva Conventions belong to the second class of texts. They all provide that a State Party must bring persons suspected of having committed, or to have ordered to be committed, grave breaches before its own courts, but that it may also, in accordance with its own legislation, hand such persons over for trial (p. 1657) to another State Party.[53] The same system has been adopted in Article 85 of Protocol I Additional. The approach of the Torture Convention is slightly different. Article 7 of the Convention obliges the State Party where the alleged offender is found to extradite him to another State Party or, if it does not extradite him, to submit the case to its own competent authorities for the purpose of prosecution. Finally, Article 17 of the 1999 Second Protocol to the Hague Convention of 1954 for the Protection of Cultural Property in the Event of Armed Conflict and Article 9 of the 1996 Draft Code also carry the obligation for the State Party where the alleged offender is found to extradite or to prosecute him.

None of the texts discussed here creates an absolute obligation for States Parties to extradite persons suspected of having committed international crimes. Their purpose is to restrict the freedom of States to refuse extradition and they achieve that purpose in different ways. They must be clearly understood against the background of the time-honoured principle of international law that no obligation to extradite exists apart from that imposed by treaty. There is no reason to suppose that they have contributed to the emergence of a new rule of customary law entailing that an unconditional obligation to extradite that does not depend on the existence of a treaty now exists where international crimes are concerned. There is not enough State practice and opinio juris to warrant a different conclusion.

Nevertheless, international crimes cannot simply be equated with other crimes were extradition is concerned. The references in the Convention on the Non-Applicability of Statutory Limitations to War Crimes and Crimes against Humanity and in various resolutions of the General Assembly to generally recognized principles of international law and to the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations are not devoid of meaning. As has been discussed, there is no longer any justification or any need for refusing extradition for international crimes on the basis of the political offence exception. It has also appeared in the discussion of other impediments to extradition that the special character of international crimes makes it desirable to give a different application to the double criminality requirement and to approach impediments to extradition such as statutes of limitation and international immunities in a different manner. Moreover, it can perhaps be argued that two general consequences flow from the fact that all States are guardians of the international legal order and that they have, therefore, a shared responsibility for the suppression of international crimes. The first would be that States are no longer entitled to refuse extradition to other States unless extradition treaties or national extradition laws provide them with convincing reasons for so deciding. The second is that they should revise their national extradition laws in order to secure that extradition does not have to be (p. 1658) refused for a reason that would perhaps be appropriate in ordinary extradition cases but should not play a role where international crimes are concerned. In Reservations to the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide the International Court of Justice attached several consequences to the fact that genocide is a crime under international law. The first is that 'the principles underlying the Convention are principles which are recognized by civilized nations as binding on States, even without any conventional obligation'. The second is 'the universal character both of the condemnation of genocide and of the cooperation required "in order to liberate man from such an odious scourge" '.[54] It is tempting to interpret this cryptic remark about the universal character of cooperation as referring to an obligation incumbent on all States not to make extradition dependent on considerations that should not matter.

Meanwhile, there may exist good reasons for not wanting to extradite the alleged offender of an international crime. One of them would be the definite risk that the requested person would, in the requesting State, be exposed to penalties forbidden by the constitution of the requested State or treatment contrary to human rights treaties. Another, more controversial, obstacle may be the fact that the person requested is a national of the requested State; in a number of legal systems the prohibition against extraditing nationals has a constitutional status. It may also be that the requested State considers itself to be in a better position to prosecute the person concerned and prefers to make use of that option. Such reasons for refusing extradition make it important to discuss the consequences of a refusal to extradite under treaty law and customary international law.

2. The Duty to Prosecute

The Geneva Conventions and Protocol I Additional, the Torture Convention, the Second Protocol to the 1954 Hague Convention and the Draft Code all impose on the States Parties a duty to prosecute a person if they do not extradite him. In doing so they make Grotius's principle aut dedere aut punire, now often rephrased as aut dedere aut judicare, a rule of positive international law. In these texts, the rule covers two situations which are rather different from each other. The first situation is the one in which an extradition request has been made but has been refused; for analytical purposes one may equate with it the situation in which no extradition request has been made because it is all too obvious that the law of the State where the alleged offender is present precludes an extradition request from being granted. Refusal of extradition carries the obligation to prosecute that person. The second situation is the one in which it appears to the State where a person is present that no other State is prosecuting him. This may, for instance, have become clear from the fact that no extradition request has been addressed to that State. Here too, the State (p. 1659) concerned is obligated to prosecute the person. With a reference to Article 17 of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, one might say that, in the first situation, the duty to prosecute is activated by the fact that other States are unable genuinely to prosecute the alleged offender while, in the second situation, there seems to be an unwillingness to do so on their side. In recent years, it has been maintained by a number of authors that the principle of aut dedere aut judicare has become a rule of customary international law. It would have acquired the character of jus cogens where aggression, war crimes, genocide, and other crimes against humanity are concerned.[55] Other authors have denied the existence of such a rule or voiced doubts.[56] This debate makes it necessary to have a closer look at the system laid down in the Geneva Conventions, Protocol I Additional, the Torture Convention, the Second Protocol to the 1954 Hague Convention and the Draft Code.

In analysing these texts it is helpful to distinguish between the duty to create jurisdiction, on the one hand, and the duty to exercise that jurisdiction in a specific situation, on the other. This distinction is explicit in the Torture Convention, the Second Protocol, and the Draft Code, while it has remained implicit in the Geneva Conventions and Protocol I. In the Torture Convention, the first duty has been laid down in Article 5. Pursuant to Article 5, States Parties must establish jurisdiction on the basis of the territoriality principle, the active nationality principle, and the passive nationality principle. They must also establish jurisdiction in cases where the alleged offender is present in their territory and they do not extradite him to another State Party. The duty to prosecute individual offenders is laid down in Article 7. It arises when a person has been found on the territory of a State Party and that State does not extradite him. The same system is adopted in Articles 16 and 17 of the Second Protocol to the 1954 Hague Convention. That of the Draft Code is more simple. Article 8 of the Draft provides that each State Party shall establish its jurisdiction over the relevant crimes irrespective of where or by whom those crimes were committed. Pursuant to Article 9 of the Draft, a State Party in whose territory an alleged offender has been found must either extradite or prosecute him. The relevant provisions of the Geneva Conventions simply state that each State Party is under the obligation to search for persons alleged to have committed grave breaches and to bring them before its own courts but that it may also, if it prefers, hand such persons over for trial to another State (p. 1660) Party. However, the obligation to bring a person before a domestic court presupposes jurisdiction over that person. From this one may conclude that, in cases in which no other domestic jurisdictional basis exists already, the universality principle applies. In sum, the proposition that the rule of aut dedere aut judicare has become jus cogens contains two different elements. The first is that customary international law requires a State to establish universal jurisdiction over international crimes with regard to all persons that are present in its territory. The second is that a State must, on that jurisdictional basis or on any other basis that may be available in domestic law, prosecute such persons if it does not extradite them or extradite them if it does not prosecute them. The rule itself expresses no preference for one alternative over the other.

The question of whether or not general international law permits States to establish universal jurisdiction over war crimes and crimes against humanity has remained controversial, although perhaps less so than in the past. It is now generally held by authors that a permissive rule indeed exists.[57] In recent years, a growing number of States have established universal jurisdiction over these crimes. Several national courts have affirmed their right to do so,[58] the case of Eichmann being the best known example.[59] In Prosecutor v. Anto Furundžija, the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia said that it would appear to be one of the consequences of the jus cogens character of the prohibition of torture that every State is entitled to investigate, prosecute and punish, or extradite individuals accused of torture, who are present in a territory under its jurisdiction.[60] There seem to be no serious indications that international law forbids a State to prosecure a person suspected of having committed an international crime on the basis that the person is found on its territory in the absence of a treaty authorizing the State to do so.

A quite different question is whether customary international law imposes a duty on States to establish universal jurisdiction over war crimes and crimes against humanity. The fact that States may have accepted a permissive rule in this respect (p. 1661) does not necessarily imply that they regard the rule as obligatory. The preliminary and more general question here is whether and under what conditions customary law requires alleged offenders of war crimes and crimes against humanity to be prosecuted and, if found guilty, to be punished. Not surprisingly, the debate over the question focuses almost exclusively on the responsibilities of the State on whose territory international crimes have been committed. This is not the proper place to join that particular debate.[61] Suffice it to say here that the establishment of two ad hoc international criminal tribunals by the Security Council strongly points at the existence of a duty incumbent on the territorial State under general international law, whatever the admitted exceptions to this duty might be. Meanwhile, where other States are concerned the answers may perhaps vary according to the specific jurisdictional basis for prosecuting an alleged offender, the degree to which a State is implicated in the crimes committed and other factors.[62]

If customary international law does impose a duty to prosecute the alleged offenders of war crimes or crimes against humanity, that duty would rest primarily with the State on whose territory these crimes have been committed. Normally, that State is in the best position effectively to prosecute the international crimes that have been committed. Moreover, more often than not the territorial State will itself have been implicated in the commission of such offences, whether actively or passively. It can be argued that this responsibility creates an obligation towards all other States to provide satisfaction by punishing the perpetrators. The obligation to prosecute the alleged offender would include an obligation to request his extradition if the person has left its territory. On the other hand, an inability genuinely to prosecute the alleged offender might sometimes result in the territorial State extraditing him to another State or surrendering him to an international criminal tribunal.

The territorial State is not necessarily the only State that may have been implicated in international crimes. It is not difficult to find examples of situations in which other States carry the primary responsibility for war crimes or crimes against humanity. In most cases, that State may well be the State whose nationality the alleged offender possesses, but one can also think of other States. The argument can be made that these States, too, have a primary duty to prosecute alleged offenders, including a duty to request their extradition if the need for such measures arises.

On the other hand, there are States not implicated in the international offences that have been committed. The situation of the State whose nationality the alleged offender possesses deserves special attention here. The prohibition against extraditing nationals, still maintained by many States, finds its main theoretical (p. 1662) justification in the conviction that prosecution of offenders by the State of their nationality should, as a matter of principle, be preferred over their extradition. It would seem that this reason for not extraditing an alleged offender to the State where he may have committed war crimes or crimes against humanity gives rise to an international duty for the State of nationality to prosecute the person itself. The same may be true for any other State refusing extradition on the grounds that it would prefer to prosecute itself the alleged offender.

Leaving apart these special situations, it is difficult to maintain that States not implicated in international offences have a primary duty to repress them. If there is a duty for them to prosecute, it would be of a secondary nature. It would arise out of the fact that another State is unable or unwilling to fulfil what is its primary duty. If they refuse an extradition request they make it impossible for the requesting State to comply with its primary duty. If they do not receive an extradition request this must mean that another State is unwilling to comply with its duty. Two comments can be made here. A secondary duty to prosecute as a consequence of a refusal of extradition is more compelling and self-evident than a secondary duty to prosecute in the absence of an extradition request. On the other hand, since the primary duty rests with the State that has been itself implicated in war crimes or crimes against humanity, the second situation is likely to occur far more often than the first.

Undoubtedly, a rule of customary law entailing a secondary duty for States to prosecute an alleged offender on its territory if extradition does not occur would be a welcome development. It would express the conviction that the repression of war crimes and crimes against humanity is of paramount importance for the maintenance of international public order and that inaction of any member of the international community in this regard amounts to acquiescence in the violation of peremptory norms.[63] However, the difficulty with the proposition that the principle of aut dedere aut judicare has become a rule of customary law is to find sufficient State practice and opinio juris in support of it. While, in recent years, the number of States establishing universal jurisdiction over war crimes and crimes against humanity may have grown and is still growing, universal jurisdiction over international crimes is, at present, far from being a worldwide phenomenon; crimes against humanity other than genocide are the most problematic category here. Some States that have, in recent years, established universal jurisdiction over international crimes have limited it to crimes committed during World War II.[64] Moreover, these States do not seem to have been motivated by the belief that it is their duty under general international law to establish universal jurisdiction. Some national courts, while accepting that international law permits States to (p. 1663) establish universal jurisdiction, have denied an obligation to do so.[65] As far as international courts are concerned, in Case concerning Application of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide (Bosnia and Herzegovina v. Yugoslavia), the International Court of Justice remarked that 'the rights and obligations enshrined by the Convention are rights and obligations erga ommes', and that the 'obligation each State … has to prevent and punish the crime of genocide is not territorially limited by the Convention'. These remarks leave open the question of whether this obligation entails a duty for States to establish universal jurisdiction over the crime of genocide.[66] While, in Prosecutor v. Anto Furundžija, the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia discussed a number of consequences of the prohibition of torture having acquired the status of jus cogens, the duty to extradite or prosecute is not among them.[67] Even GA Resolution 3074 (XXVIII) states that persons suspected of having committed international crimes shall, 'as a general rule', be subject to trial in the countries in which they committed those crimes, other countries providing assistance by extraditing them. Similarly, the reference in the Preamble to the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court to 'the duty of every State to exercise its criminal jurisdiction over those responsible for international crimes' does not necessarily include States other than those which have a primary duty to prosecute.[68] However, in an obiter in Prosecutor v. Tihomir Blaškić, the Appeals Chamber of the ICTY stated that there is an obligation under customary law for States to try or extradite persons who have allegedly committed grave breaches of international humanitarian law. It referred to the United States military manual on the law of land warfare for support of its view; the fact that the Geneva Conventions have been almost universally ratified may also have influenced the Chamber.[69] Notwithstanding the opinion of the Tribunal, it is still dubious whether the principle of aut dedere aut judicare has already become a peremptory norm of international law with regard to all international crimes and all States. But it may well acquire that character in the future. Much will depend on the adoption and ratification of the Code of Crimes against the Peace and Security of Mankind, as well as on State practice that may develop after the entry into force of the Statute of the International Criminal Court.

(p. 1664) IV. Surrender and Transfer under the Statutes of the Ad Hoc International Criminal Tribunals for the Former Yugoslavia and Rwanda[70]

A. The Duty to Arrest and Transfer

1. Nature and Scope of the Duty

Article 29, first paragraph, of the Statute of the ICTY provides that States 'shall cooperate with the International Tribunal in the investigation and prosecution of persons accused of committing serious violations of international humanitarian law'. The second paragraph specifies that States 'shall comply without undue delay with any request for assistance or an order issued by a Trial Chamber, including, but not limited to: … (d) the arrest and detention of persons; (e) the surrender or the transfer of the accused to the International Tribunal'. Article 28 of the Statute of the ICTR is identical to Article 29. Both articles derive their binding force from the provisions of Chapter VII and Article 25 of the Charter of the United Nations. The Appeals Chamber of the ICTY has held that they 'impose an obligation on Member States of the United Nations towards all other Member States or, in other words, an obligation "erga omnes partes" '.[71] The binding force of both articles is also underlined in the Report of the Secretary-General containing the Statute of the ICTY, where it is said that an order by a tribunal for the surrender or transfer of persons to the custody of the Tribunal 'shall be considered to be the application of an enforcement measure under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations'.[72] Important legal consequences flow from this set of provisions of the Charter and the two Statutes. Pursuant to Article 103 of the Charter, obligations of Member States under the Charter prevail over obligations they may have assumed under any other international agreement. Moreover, Member States must take all measures necessary to implement the provisions of the Statutes and they cannot invoke the provisions of internal law as justification for a failure to comply with a request or order of a tribunal. Rule 58 of the RPE of the two Tribunals summarizes the legal situation by stating that the obligations laid down in Article 29, c.q. 28, of the Statute 'shall prevail over any legal impediment to the surrender or transfer of the accused or of a witness to the Tribunal which may exist under the national law or extradition treaties of the State concerned'. All this seems (p. 1665) to imply that constitutional impediments to the handing over of persons to a tribunal are as irrelevant as other impediments in domestic law.[73] It also implies that a Member State may not invoke the provisions of human rights treaties to which it is a party in order to justify a refusal of transfer. The only, rather theoretical, situation in which transfer might be refused is that in which jus cogens would forbid a State to transfer a person. In all these respects transfer of persons to a tribunal is fundamentally different from extradition of persons between States.

Pursuant to Article 29, first paragraph, of the Statute of the ICTY and Article 28, first paragraph, of the Statute of the ICTR, States have an obligation to cooperate with the Tribunals in the investigation and prosecution of persons 'accused' of committing serious violations of international humanitarian law. Paragraph 2 of these articles contain an explicit duty for States to comply with requests for the surrender or the transfer of the 'accused'. They also provide for a duty to arrest and detain 'persons'. In conformity with the system of the Statutes, Rule 2 of the RPE defines the accused as 'a person against whom one or more counts in an indictment have been confirmed in accordance with Rule 47'. At first sight, paragraphs 1 and 2, read together, seem to exclude an obligation to transfer persons who, while being regarded as suspects by a tribunal, cannot yet be considered to be accused persons within the meaning of the provisions of the Statutes and the RPE. A similar conclusion could be drawn with regard to persons who have been convicted by a final judgment of a tribunal, since they cannot any more be considered to be accused persons. However, the duty to transfer such persons on request might perhaps find its basis in the general obligation, laid down in both articles, to comply with any request of the Tribunals. According to both provisions, that duty includes, but is not limited to, transfer of the accused. This interpretation may find support in the Report of the Secretary-General containing the Statute of the ICTY. In the Report it is said that States are under an obligation to cooperate 'in all stages of the proceedings'.[74] Pursuant to Rule 40 of the ICTY's Rules of Procedure, States must, in case of urgency, provisionally arrest a person who has not yet been accused on the request of the Prosecutor and take all necessary measures to prevent his escape, while Rule 40 bis envisages his transfer on the order of a judge.[75] There is no provision in the RPE on requests for the transfer of convicted persons for the purpose of enforcing a judgment. Meanwhile, many implementing laws provide for a possibility of transferring convicted persons; so do the agreements concluded between the Tribunals and the United States.

(p. 1666) 2. Terminology

Articles 19 and 29 of the Statute of the ICTY and Articles 18 and 28 of the Statute of the ICTR distinguish between 'surrender' and 'transfer' of the accused. It is not clear what this distinction implies. Morris and Scharf have suggested that the term 'surrender' refers to a situation in which a person is already in custody pursuant to action taken by the national authorities under national law. The term 'transfer' would refer to the situation in which a person is taken into custody pursuant to an order of a tribunal, and, therefore, is in the constructive custody of a tribunal at the time of arrest.[76] While this may well be what the framers of the Statutes had in mind, the Rules of Procedure and Evidence show a marked preference for the term 'transfer'.[77] This may either mean that the framers of the Rules did not want to make a distinction between 'transfer' and 'surrender' or thought it highly unlikely that a person whose appearance before a tribunal is wanted would already have been deprived of his liberty at the moment of a request made by a tribunal. Whatever the correct explanation may be, in the Rules of Procedure and Evidence no particular legal consequences seem to attach to the distinction from the perspective of the Tribunals. Henceforth, I will, therefore, follow the preference of the Rules for the term 'transfer'.[78]

3. Specific Aspects of the Duty to Transfer

It is interesting as well as important to explore the consequences of the obligations imposed on the Member States of the United Nations in more detail, especially since some national laws implementing the Statutes seem to be insufficiently aware of them or to refuse to accept them. In doing so I will focus on a number of circumstances that may, in extradition law and practice, cause States to refuse an extradition request. Probable cause, arrest, provisional arrest, and other procedural matters will be discussed elsewhere.[79]

A rather common requirement for extraditing persons to other States is the existence of a treaty. In some legal systems, it even has a constitutional status.[80] While States are free to conclude agreements with the Tribunals on the transfer of persons, they cannot refuse transfer in the absence of an agreement. In 1997, a United (p. 1667) States District Court denied a request of the US government for the surrender of Elizaphan Ntakirutimana to the ICTR on the grounds that the bilateral agreement concluded between the United States and the ICTR did not provide a proper treaty basis for the surrender of the accused.[81] However, a second request for the surrender of the same person was later granted by the same court and upheld by the US Court of Appeals, Fifth Circuit.[82] In the absence of a treaty, solutions might consist in amending provisions of domestic law, in considering the Charter of the United Nations a sufficient treaty basis or, possibly less convincing, in assuming that the transfer of a person to an international tribunal does not amount to extradition within the ordinary meaning of that term in domestic legislation of the requested State.[83]

Without any doubt the most common condition for extraditing a person is the double criminality requirement. Some national implementing statutes maintain that requirement where transfer of persons to the Tribunals is concerned.[84] However, Articles 29 and 28 of the Statutes of the Tribunals leave no room for requiring that the acts alleged constitute offences according to the law of the requested State. The only question that matters is whether or not they constitute crimes within the meaning of the provisions of these Statutes and had become crimes under general international law at the time of their commission. It is for the Tribunals to make a decision on that matter, the competent national authorities having to comply with it. The only option open to them is to suggest a tribunal to reconsider its decision. Neither is it relevant whether or not national statutes of limitations would have barred prosecution of the requested person before a national court. For one thing, the ICTY has held that statutes of limitation cannot be applied to international crimes.[85] Moreover, Articles 29 and 28 of the Statutes preclude States from maintaining this condition.

As a matter of course, traditional exceptions in extradition law which attach consequences to the nature of certain acts, such as the politicial and the military offence exception, cannot serve as justifications for refusing transfer of a person to (p. 1668) a tribunal. Articles 29 and 28 of the Statutes make no mention of them. Moreover, in Prosecutor v. Anto Furundžija, the ICTY held that to apply the political offence exception to war crimes and crimes against humanity would, in its view, violate jus cogens.[86]

Probably the most painful consequence of Articles 29 and 28 for a considerable number of States is that they make no exception with regard to the transfer of nationals. Many, although not all, civil-law systems refuse to extradite their nationals as a matter of principle. In some legal systems, the prohibition on extraditing nationals has a constitutional status. There is no implementing law explicitly and unconditionally forbidding the transfer of a national to an international tribunal. This does not necessarily mean that they all permit the transfer of nationals. Some implementing laws simply apply existing legislation on extradition mutatis mutandis where the conditions and procedures for transfer are concerned; the somewhat unlucky consequence of this legislative technique is that it makes it impossible immediately to determine whether or not they rule out transfer of nationals.[87] Article 10 of the Swiss Federal Order permits the transfer of Swiss citizens only if a guarantee has been given that he or she will be returned to Switzerland after the proceedings.[88] The question of whether national implementing laws allow the transfer of nationals is particularly relevant in the case of Austria, Croatia, and Germany, as the national constitutions of these three States forbids extradition of citizens to other States. Article 5 of the Austrian law explictly permits the transfer of Austrian citizens.[89] The German implementing law is silent on this point. It appears from its legislative history that the German legislator did not intend to make an exception to Article 16 of the German Constitution, which rules out the extradition of citizens.[90] Meanwhile, a revision of the Constitution has now been proposed. Finally, Article 3 of the Croatian implementing law makes transfer of persons dependent on respect for the Constitution of Croatia.[91] However, in actual practice the Constitution of Yugoslavia, in combination with the absence of adequate legislation implementing the Statute of the ICTY, has caused the most serious difficulties. Repeatedly, (p. 1669) Yugoslavia has invoked inadequacy of national legislation as an excuse for not surrendering nationals. This led the Security Council to adopt Resolution 1207 (1998), in which it called upon Yugoslavia and other States to take any measures necessary under their domestic law to implement the provisions of the Statute.[92]

Another traditional impediment to extradition are immunities under national or international law. It goes without saying that immunities under national law cannot bar the transfer of suspects or accused persons to the Tribunals. The same is probably true for international immunities.

Many extradition statutes and extradition treaties contain provisions aiming to protect the basic individual rights of the person requested against (potential) incursions by the requesting State. Among them one may mention as examples the prohibition against extraditing refugees and clauses forbidding the extradition of a person if that person would have to stand trial before a 'special court', i.e. a court created for special occasions under circumstances that cast serious doubt on its independence and impartiality. It is relevant to note here that the ICTY has already discussed the manner in which it was established in Prosecutor v. Duško Tadić.[93] It came to the conclusion that it had been 'established by law' within the meaning of the provisions of the ICCPR and of other human rights treaties and that its Statute provided all the necessary safeguards of a fair trial. Apart from that, Articles 29 and 28 of the Statutes of the Tribunals do not permit States to advance human rights arguments against transfer.

The same conclusion must be drawn with regard to exceptions in extradition laws and treaties that aim to protect the requested person against certain types of punishment, in particular the death penalty and, more rarely, life-long imprisonment. While the Statutes of both Tribunals do not permit the imposition of capital punishment, they do not rule out life sentences. Rule 101 of the RPE states that a convicted person may be sentenced to imprisonment up to the remainder his life.[94] What is true for these exceptions must also be true for exceptions aiming to protect a person against inhuman or degrading treatment while his sentence is being enforced.

(p. 1670) The Belgian Act implementing the provisions of the Statutes deserves special attention here. It is the only implementing law explicitly making transfer conditional on due respect for a person's rights under human rights conventions. Article 13 of the Belgian Act provides that Belgium will surrender persons to a tribunal 'in accordance with the terms' of the European Human Rights Convention.[95] However, it appears from the legislative history of the Act that the purpose of this provision is rather limited. The provision must be understood against the background of Soering v. the United Kingdom,[96] Under the European Convention Belgium would not be permitted to surrender a person to a tribunal if the conditions in which that person would have to serve his sentence would amount to inhuman or degrading treatment; there were worries in the Belgian parliament that this might nevertheless happen in the case of surrender of a person to the ICTR.[97] What the provision actually requires the Belgian government to do in the case of surrender is to discuss with a tribunal where that person would have to serve his sentence later.

Extradition treaties and extradition statutes usually authorize or require the competent authorities of the requested State to refuse extradition if the person requested is being prosecuted or has been tried and convicted or acquitted by the requested State for the offence for which extradition is requested. Similar provisions can be found in some implementing statutes.[98] Refusal of surrender is not permitted by Articles 29 and 28 of the Statutes. Pursuant to Articles 9 and 10 of the Statute of the ICTY and 8 and 9 of the Statute of the ICTR, it is for the Tribunal to determine whether or not a person should be tried before it notwithstanding the fact that he is being tried or has been tried for the same offence before a national court. Similar considerations apply in the case of an order of a tribunal for transfer concurring with an extradition request made by another State. Pursuant to Article 103 of the Charter and Rule 58 of the RPE, priority must be given to a tribunal's order.

It is a normal phenomenon in extradition law and practice that extradition is granted under conditions. The most common condition is that the person whose extradition has been granted shall not be proceeded against for any offence committed prior to his surrender other than that for which he was extradited without the consent of the surrendering State. Articles 29 and 28 of the Statutes do not permit States to attach similar conditions to the surrender of a person to a tribunal.[99]

(p. 1671) B. Arrest and Transfer Proceedings

Rules 54–61 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence of the Tribunals contain a set of provisions with regard to procedures to be followed where the issuance of and compliance with warrants for the arrest of the accused or other warrants are concerned. Additional provisions with regard to the arrest of suspects are included in Rules 40–43.[100]

In the matter of arrest warrants, the Rules distinguish between orders for the arrest and transfer of accused persons, on the one hand, and requests for the arrest and orders for the transfer of suspects, on the other.

Pursuant to Rules 47 and 61, orders for the arrest and transfer of accused persons may be made either by a judge or a Trial Chamber. Requests for the (provisional) arrest of suspects may be made by the Prosecutor on the basis of Rule 40. In addition, Rule 40 of the ICTR's RPE and Rule 40 bis of the RPE of both Tribunals authorize a judge to order transfer of the suspect on request of the Prosecutor; Rules 40 and 40 bis of the ICTY's RPE also apply to the accused. According to Rule 2 of the RPE of both Tribunals, an accused is a person against whom one or more counts in an indictment have been confirmed by a judge. Pursuant to Articles 19 and 18 of the Statutes, confirmation of an indictment implies that the judge is satisfied that a prima facie case has been established. Rule 47(B) indicates that this standard is met when 'there is sufficient evidence to provide reasonable grounds for believing that a suspect has committed a crime within the jurisdiction of the Tribunal'. The standard has also been understood by the ICTY as requiring that 'the material facts pleaded in the indictment constitute a credible case which would (if not contradicted by the accused) be a sufficient basis to convict him of that charge'.[101] On the other hand, a suspect is defined by Rule 2 as a 'person concerning whom the Prosecutor possesses reliable information which tends to show that the person may have committed a crime over which the Tribunal has jurisdiction. Pursuant to Rule 40 bis(B), orders for the transfer of the suspect may be issued by a judge if he considers that there is a 'reliable and consistent body of material' that this is the case.

All requests and orders for the arrest and/or transfer of accused persons and suspects must be complied with by the State to which they have been directed. Pursuant to Rule 61, an additional obligation to freeze the assets of the accused may be imposed on all States in the case of an international arrest warrant issued by the Trial Chamber. Although the RPE are silent on this point, the ICTY (p. 1672) accepts that such a consequential order may also be issued in the case of an arrest warrant issued pursuant to Rule 47.[102] Orders to freeze assets of the accused may serve the purpose of preventing the accused from using those assets to evade arrest.[103]

One may expect the ability and willingness of States to comply with requests and orders to arrest or transfer a person largely to depend on the information forwarded to them by a tribunal. In this respect, Rule 55(C) provides that a certified copy of the warrant for the arrest of an accused shall be transmitted, together with a certified copy of the indictment and a statement of the rights of the accused. Pursuant to Rule 47(C), the indictment shall set forth the name and particulars of the person concerned and a concise statement of the facts of the case and of the crime with which that person is charged. Rule 55 does not require that any material accompanying the indictment be provided to States. The most important consequence is that States may not require a tribunal to transmit supporting evidentiary material to them. As far as request for the provisional arrest of suspects and orders for their transfer are concerned, Rules 40 and 40 bis do not specify what information should be transmitted to the State that is expected to effect arrest or transfer. This system raises a number of questions pertaining to the duty of States to comply with orders and requests. In discussing these questions, one must distinguish between common-law and civil-law systems of justice.

The system laid down in the RPE causes few difficulties to most civil-law systems of justice. It is basically similar to the system they are used to in extradition cases. Normally, they trust the courts of the requesting State to have serious reasons for ordering the arrest of a person. There is, therefore, no need for the requesting State to provide the requested State with evidence supporting an arrest warrant. Only in exceptional cases in which grave doubts have arisen as to whether the person to be extradited may have committed the alleged offence will they request additional information or refuse extradition altogether. Meanwhile, a number of implementing laws adopted by European States make it possible to refuse transfer where it cannot be established that the person arrested is the person whose transfer has been requested or ordered and/or where it appears that transfer has been requested on account of offences in respect of which a tribunal has no jurisdiction.[104] These grounds for refusing transfer have been suggested by a committee of European experts in 1993. Obviously, a person should not be transferred if it appears that a tribunal has no jurisdiction or that the person arrested is not the person requested. However, the relevant national provisions seem to ignore the (p. 1673) fact that the final decision on these matters lies with the Tribunal. Articles 29 and 28 of the Statutes leave no room for a different conclusion. Rather than refusing transfer, the competent national authorities should, therefore, start consultations with the Tribunal. This may cause the Tribunal to withdraw its request or to permit the national authorities to release a person pending a reconsideration of its request.

The Rules of Procedure and Evidence present more novelties to most common-law systems of justice.[105] Traditionally, they require that requests for the arrest and extradition of persons who have not yet been convicted be accompanied by supporting evidentiary material. Usually, the evidence must be sufficient to justify a person's arrest and his committal for trial, and arrest will be refused if the material presented does not satisfy the standard applied. The question might arise as to whether the standards in the Rules for requesting the arrest or ordering the transfer of a suspect are as exacting as domestic standards with regard to the arrest of persons within the framework of extradition proceedings.[106] Whatever the answer may be according to the law of a particular common-law system of justice, the question itself is not of any importance since the RPE have dispensed with evidentiary requirements altogether. This represents a significant departure from habitual standards of protection and legal security applied by common-law systems in extradition cases. Australia, Ireland, New Zealand, and the United Kingdom have, in their acts or orders implementing the Statutes, drawn the consequence that they will not require a tribunal to present evidentiary material in support of its requests or orders for arrest or transfer. In view of the fact that the fourth amendment to the American Constitution requires a finding of probable cause for the arrest of a person, the United States has pursued a different course. It has negotiated agreements with the two Tribunals enabling it to require of them that requests for surrender of an accused or suspect be supported by information sufficient to establish that there is a reasonable basis to believe that the person has committed a crime within their jurisdiction.[107]

C. Failure to Execute Warrants of Arrest or Transfer

A remarkable aspect of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence is that they mention two different warrants for the arrest of the accused. The first warrant is issued by a judge after confirmation of an indictment on the basis of Rules 47 and 54.

(p. 1674) Pursuant to Rules 56 and 59 bis (A), it is transmitted to a State or to 'an appropriate authority' or 'international body'. It appears from Rule 61 (A) that this warrant will normally be transmitted to the authorities of the State in whose territory or under whose jurisdiction and control the person to be served with the indictment resides or was last known to be. The second arrest warrant is issued by the Trial Chamber pursuant to Rule 61. In Rule 61(D), it is called an 'international arrest warrant' in order to distinguish it from a warrant issued pursuant to Rules 47 and 54. Rule 61 (D) provides that it shall be sent to all States and that it may be accompanied by an order provisionally to freeze the assets of the accused.

The international arrest warrant of Rule 61 is meant to be an official reaction of a tribunal to the failure of a State to execute an arrest warrant issued on the basis of Rules 47 and 54. Pursuant to Rule 61, if a warrant of arrest has not been executed and personal service of the indictment has consequently not been effected, the judge who confirmed the indictment may order that the indictment be submitted to the Trial Chamber. The indictment will then be submitted in open court, together with all the evidence that was before the judge who initially confirmed the indictment. Witnesses whose statements have been submitted to the confirming judge may be called. The Trial Chamber must then determine whether or not there are reasonable grounds for believing that the accused has committed all or any of the crimes charged in the indictment. If it reaches that conclusion, it will have the indictment read out in open court. One of the consequences of such a determination is that an international arrest warrant is issued by the Trial Chamber. The other consequence may consist of an official certification by the Trial Chamber that the failure to effect personal service of the indictment was due in whole or in part to a failure or refusal of a State to which the initial arrest warrant was transmitted to cooperate with the Tribunal. The President of the Tribunal may then notify the Security Council that this State has failed to comply with its obligations under the Statute.

Up to the end of 1998 there have been four cases in which a Trial Chamber of the ICTY arrived at the conclusion that a State or non-State entity had failed to execute an arrest warrant and issued an international arrest warrant pursuant to Rule 61.[108] In all cases, the President of the Tribunal has notified the Security Council, in one of them repeatedly.[109] In all of them the Security Council agreed with the ICTY that Article 29 of the Statute was not complied with by the State or entity (p. 1675) concerned, but it never took further action.[110] In addition, one may note that application of Rule 61 is not the only avenue for the ICTY to inform the Security Council of failures to execute arrest warrants. Rule 7*bis* is also relevant here. It has been applied by the ICTY on two different occasions.[111] As far as the ICTR is concerned, it has never applied Rule 61.

Against the general background of current practices in the field of extradition, the international arrest warrant of Rule 61 is rather unique. Moreover, from a strictly legal point of view there is not really a need for it.[112] There is nothing in international law which prohibits the transmission of requests or orders for arrest or transfer issued pursuant to Rules 40 and 47 to any State which may be or may be come later in a position in which it could arrest an accused or a suspect. Orders for the arrest of an accused may, too, be accompanied by an order to freeze his assets. Finally, the reporting of failures to comply with requests or orders to the Security Council does not depend on the application of Rule 61. The real importance of the rule lies elsewhere. On the one hand, the use of it, or the threat of using it, might cause the State which is reluctant to execute an arrest warrant to change its mind. However, Rule 61 does not seem to have been a very effective weapon in this respect. On the other hand, considerations related to the fact that trials in absentia are not permitted also explain why both Tribunals have felt the need to create a special procedure in case of failures to execute arrest warrants. They cannot be discussed here.[113]

D. Deportation, Expulsion, and Abduction

Deportation, expulsion, and other means used by the State on whose territory an accused or suspect is present to remove him have played no visible role in securing the presence of these persons before a tribunal. There seems to be hardly any need for that State to have resort to them since arrest and transfer on request of a tribunal will almost always offer a better and more effective solution. Matters are different, however, where abduction and other methods of getting hold of a person are concerned, which usually derive their efficacy from the fact that the State where a person remains is kept unaware of them. There may be a special temptation to use these methods in relation to States which have refused to comply with requests or orders for arrest or transfer issued by a tribunal. The ICTY has been confronted twice with a case in which the manner a person was arrested and (p. 1676) transferred became an issue. A mention of these cases must suffice here. In Prosecutor v. Slavko Dokmanović the ICTY had to decide on the legality of the luring of the accused into leaving his home in Yugoslavia and travelling to Croatia, where he was subsequently arrested by UNTAES. The luring was performed by an investigator of the ICTY's Office of the Prosecutor. Distinguishing luring from abduction, the Trial Chamber of the ICTY held that the means used to accomplish the accused's arrest neither violated principles of international law nor the sovereignty of Yugoslavia.[114] In Prosecutor v. Stevan Todorović, the Trial Chamber did not decide on the alleged kidnapping of the accused on the territory of Yugoslavia and his transfer to the Tuzla Air Force base in Bosnia and Herzegovina, the accused having negotiated a plea agreement with the Prosecutor which was accepted by the Trial Chamber.[115]

V. Arrest and Surrender under the Rome Statute

A. General Observations

1. The System of the Statute

Part 9 of the Rome Statute, comprising Articles 86 to 102, is devoted to international cooperation and judicial assistance. It has regard to the surrender of persons to the Court as well as other forms of assistance during investigation and trial.[116] The assistance of States in the enforcement of judgments of the Court, which may also necessitate the surrender of persons, is dealt with in Part 10. A number of articles in Part 9 more specifically deal with surrender of persons suspected or accused of, or convicted of, crimes under the Statute: Articles 89 to 92 (p. 1677) and 101 to 102. These are not the only provisions in the Statute on surrender. Articles 58 and 59, included in the Statute's Part 5 on investigation and prosecution, are also of great importance. Generally speaking, one might say that the provisions of Part 5 deal with the Court's powers to order arrest and surrender, while those of Part 9 are mainly concerned with the execution of requests by States. However, the distinction between the two perspectives has not been rigorously maintained. For instance, Article 59 contains rules with regard to arrest proceedings in the custodial State. Finally, the provisions in Part 2 on jurisdiction and admissibility have an immediate and profound impact on the making of requests for surrender by the Court and the duty of States to comply with them. In addition to the provisions of the Statute, the Rules of Procedure and Evidence, to be adopted by the Assembly of States Parties pursuant to Article 51 of the Statute, have a role to play, albeit a very modest one, apparently. As far as surrender is concerned, only Articles 57,87, and 92 of the Statute make a reference to the Rules.[117] This is not surprising since most articles in the Statute on surrender compare to those of the average extradition treaty in their desire to be as precise as possible. Moreover, the differences in this regard between the Rome Statute and the Statutes of the two ad hoc Criminal Tribunals could not be more striking. In the following, I will mainly concentrate on the provisions of Part 9.

Some remarks should also be made here with regard to the referral of a situation to the Court by the Security Council pursuant to Article 13 of the Statute. The fact that the Security Council, in doing so, is acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations has a number of important consequences for the system of surrender. The obligations arising out of Parts 5 and 9 for States in the matter of arrest and surrender thereby become obligations for all Member States of the United Nations regardless of whether or not they are Parties to the Statute. Moreover, pursuant to Article 25 of the Charter, they acquire the character of obligations erga omnes while, as a consequence of Article 103 of the Charter, they prevail over obligations Member States may have assumed under any other international agreement. Whether or not a referral would automatically entail that the provisions of Article 90 of the Statute with regard to competing requests cease to be applicable is less clear. To the extent that the provisions in Part 2 of the Statute attach special consequences to a referral by the Security Council or the Council itself would decide that not all provisions in Part 2 on jurisdiction and admissibility should be applied in the matter referred to the Court, the system of surrender would also be affected.[118]

(p. 1678) 2. 'Surrender' and 'Extradition'

While almost until the end of the 1998 Rome Diplomatic Conference no choice had been made between the terms 'surrender', 'transfer', and 'extradition' to designate the process of bringing a person within the jurisdiction of the Court for the purpose of trying him or enforcing a sentence against him, the Conference finally pronounced itself in favour of the term 'surrender'. Perhaps the choice between 'surrender' and 'transfer' did not matter too much.[119] But it was different for the choice between 'surrender' and 'extradition'.

For the purposes of the Statute, Article 102 defines the term 'surrender' as the delivering up of a person by a State to the Court pursuant to the Statute, while the term 'extradition' means the delivering up of a person by one State to another as provided by treaty, convention, or national legislation. Article 102 has been included in the Statute in order to make clear that the handing over of a person to the International Criminal Court is fundamentally different in nature from the handing over of a person within the framework of extradition between States.

In English, as well as other languages, various expressions may designate the process of handing over a person to a different 'jurisdictional unit' for the purpose of enabling that 'unit' to try him or to enforce a sentence against him. To that end, the words 'extradition', 'rendition', 'surrender', 'transfer', or other words, may be used. National legal systems may choose different expressions for designating different processes. Thus, in the United States, the term '(interstate) rendition' is sometimes used as an alternative to the term 'extradition' where the return of a person from one state to another within the United States is concerned. In treaties, conventions, and other international agreements, there is also a certain tendency to use different expressions for different situations. While the word 'extradition' is normally used for the process culminating in the physical transfer of a person from the territory of one State to that of another State, often different expressions are, for instance, employed with regard to the delivering of persons on the basis of international agreements on the status of military forces, which does not normally involve a crossing of national borders.[120]

At the international level, no fixed and commonly accepted terminology has as yet emerged distinguishing the delivering of persons accused or convicted of having committed international crimes to the authorities of other States from delivering other persons to them. On the one hand, some texts avoid the expression 'extradition' here, and they seem to do this on purpose. Examples are the Treaty of (p. 1679) Versailles, the 1943 Moscow Declaration, and the 1949 Geneva Conventions.[121] On the other hand, other texts, such as the Genocide Convention, the Convention on the Non-Applicability of Statutory Limitations to War Crimes and Crimes against Humanity, and the various Resolutions adopted by the General Assembly of the United Nations during the 1960s and the 1970s, continue to make use of the term 'extradition'.[122] There is a stronger tendency to use a different terminology where the delivery of such persons to international judicial bodies is concerned. The first example here is provided by the Treaty of Versailles.[123] The example has been followed in the 1945 London Agreement establishing the Nuremberg Tribunal and the Statutes of the two ad hoc international criminal tribunals created by the United Nations in the 1990s.[124] The Rome Statute conforms to that practice.

Terminological debates are usually closely connected with debates on matters of substance. Several weighty arguments can be advanced as to why the handing over of a person to an international judicial body such as the two ad hoc Tribunals and the Rome Court should not be subjected to the same restrictions and conditions and should not be decided upon in conformity with the same procedural rules as are standard in ordinary extradition cases.[125] It is one of the merits of the Statute that it has largely succeeded in creating a special regime with regard to the delivery of persons accused or convicted of crimes under general international law without which the Court would not be able to fulfil the expectations of the community of nations. It is only proper that the Statute has underlined this fundamental choice by designating the process of delivering by the word 'surrender' instead of 'extradition'.

Meanwhile, the question remains whether the system created is acceptable to all States, or at least to a sufficient number of them. The debate that has been conducted in Rome over the proper regime for handing over persons to the Court will, of necessity, be repeated at a national level when it comes to the decision of individual States whether or not to proceed to the Statute's ratification. In this regard, questions of terminology again become important, especially in States whose national constitutions contain provisions on extraditing persons to other States. These provisions, more often than not included in chapters dealing with (p. 1680) basic individual rights, may, for instance, require that extradition takes place on the basis of a treaty, declare that nationals may not be extradited, forbid extradition for political offences or afford those persecuted in other countries an individual right to be granted asylum. It is obvious that, in a large majority of cases, such constitutional provisions have not been adopted with the surrender of persons to international judicial bodies in mind, and that there would be little or no reason to apply them to the situation. However, it is for every State to make its own choices and decisions here. In this regard, the purpose of Article 102 is essentially political. The article is intended to make it easier for States whose national constitutions forbid the extradition of persons in certain situations to become Parties to the Statute, either by interpreting constitutional provisions narrowly or by amending them in order to eliminate constitutional barriers. In particular, constitutional prohibitions with regard to the extradition of nationals are of importance in this respect.[126] However, whether Article 102 will help States to overcome their constitutional hesitations is another matter.

B. The Duty to Arrest and Surrender

1. Nature and Scope of the Duty

Article 86 of the Statute imposes on States Parties the duty, in accordance with the provisions of the Statute, fully to cooperate with the Court in its investigation and prosecution of crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court. Article 89(1) restates that obligation where arrest and surrender are concerned. Pursuant to this provision, States Parties shall comply with requests for arrest and surrender in accordance with the provisions of Part 9 and 'the procedure under national law'. The duty to surrender includes the duty to authorize transit.[127]

The reference in Article 89 to national procedures makes clear that substantive grounds for refusing surrender which are normal in domestic extradition law do not matter here. This is also true for prohibitions against extradition which may have been included in national constitutions.[128] In this regard, there are no differences between the Rome Statute and the Statutes of the two ad hoc Tribunals. The fundamental difference between the duty of States to cooperate under the Statute and the duty to cooperate with the ad hoc Tribunals under their Statutes lies elsewhere. Since the ad hoc Tribunals have been established pursuant to resolutions of the Security Council the obligation for States to cooperate prevail over obligations (p. 1681) they may have assumed under any other international agreement.[129] This is not the case for the obligations arising out of the Rome Statute, at least not unless the Security Council has referred a situation to the Court. To some extent, the Rome Statute has anticipated the possibility of conflicting obligations and tried to find a solution for them. This is, for instance, the case for requests for surrender competing with extradition requests, a matter dealt with in great detail by Article 90 of the Statute. Another example is provided by Article 96, which is concerned with surrender in the case of persons protected against extradition by other international agreements, in particular diplomats or members of the military of another State. Finally, in various provisions of the Statute care has been taken to provide a consistent body of rules with regard to arrest and detention of persons by the requested State, thus reducing the possibility that the obligation for a State under the Statute to arrest and detain a person conflicts with its obligation under one or more human rights treaties to respect that person's liberty and security.[130] However, it is, of course, difficult to anticipate all conflicts which might arise. For instance, a situation of conflicting treaty obligations not anticipated by the Statute may arise if the person whose surrender is requested by the Court has previously been extradited to the requested State by another State which is not willing to give its consent to the person's surrender. In such situations, the solution must be found in the application of the principles of international law with regard to conflicting treaty obligations. In this respect, it may matter whether or not the third State whose rights would be infringed by surrender of a person to the Court is itself a party to the Statute.

2. States Parties

As has been noted already, it is the fundamental achievement of the Statute that the duty of States Parties to comply with requests for surrender is not made subject to exceptions which are normal in extradition law and practice. The history of the Rome Diplomatic Conference makes clear that this result was not easily obtained.[131] In the following, I will briefly examine the implications.[132]

Where surrender of persons to the Court is concerned, a State Party is not entitled to refuse cooperation on the grounds that the conduct does not constitute a criminal offence according to domestic law. Ideally, the problem should never arise. A loyal implementation of the Statute by the States Parties in their domestic laws would seem to imply that they criminalize the conduct over which the Court has jurisdiction and do so in conformity with Articles 5 to 8 and 22 to 33 of the Statute since, as the Preamble to the Statute states, it is the duty of every State to (p. 1682) exercise its jurisdiction over those responsible for international crimes.[133] Otherwise the Court may have to exercise its jurisdiction for the reason that the State is unable or unwilling genuinely to carry out an investigation or prosecution. Be that as it may, assuming that the provisions in the Statute on the crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court and those on general principles of criminal law reflect customary international law, there is no valid reason to refuse surrender. Apart from that, Articles 86 and 89 leave no room for refusal in this respect. The only reason for refusal could conceivably be that surrender is requested for a crime that is not within the jurisdiction of the Court; that situation will be discussed below.[134]

For the same reasons, States Parties may not refuse surrender because the conduct did not, according to their domestic laws, constitute a criminal offence at the time of its commission or that a statute of limitation would apply. Individual responsibility for crimes under general international law is not affected by absence of criminalization at a national level, while customary international law might entail that statutes of limitation do not apply to these crimes.[135] Ideally, a faithful implementation of the Statute would then again imply that these questions never arise within the framework of surrender proceedings. Apart from that, Articles 22 to 24 and 29 of the Statute contain their own rules with regard to the punishability of conduct at the time it was committed and with regard to statutes of limitation. It follows from Articles 86 and 89 that comparable rules of the requested State Party do not matter here.

Standard exceptions in extradition treaties and extradition laws with regard to the duty or authorization to deliver up a person have regard to the place of commission of the offence and the absence of extraterritorial jurisdiction over the offence in a similar situation. It is obvious from the various provisions of the Statute, in particular those on complementarity, that the fact that a crime has been committed on the territory of the requested State Party or that the State Party would not be able to prosecute the alleged offender because it would not have extraterritorial jurisdiction over the crime in a similar situation cannot play a role where surrender of persons to the Court is concerned.

Articles 86 and 89 of the Statute do not permit States Parties to refuse surrender for reasons related to the nature of the offence or to the personal status of the person requested, such as his nationality or his diplomatic status. It is obvious that the political or military character of an offence should not be a reason to refuse sur(p. 1683) render.[136] No case in favour of retaining these exceptions seems to have been made during the Rome Diplomatic Conference. This was different for the nationality of the person requested. Protracted debates were conducted on the issue.[137] This should not come as a surprise. The prohibition against extraditing nationals is a marked feature of extradition law of many civil-law systems of justice and it has a constitutional status in some of them. Although it seems somewhat on the decline,[138] it is still maintained in many extradition laws and extradition treaties. At any rate, the resistance against extraditing nationals is still so strong that the prohibition has been maintained in a number of national laws implementing the Statutes of the ad hoc Tribunals, while it has been the main stumbling block for the ICTY in obtaining the transfer of accused persons from Croatia and Yugoslavia.[139] During the Conference, a compromise proposal was made to permit States Parties to make surrender of a national conditional on the person being returned to them for service of any sentence imposed. The proposal added the provisos that these States must have indicated their willingness to accept sentenced persons under the Statute's provision on enforcement of sentences and that the Court agrees with the condition being made.[140] The idea of making the delivering up of a national conditional on his return after being tried is certainly not new.[141] However, the proposal was eventually dropped and no exception or restriction with regard to the duty to surrender nationals has been included in the Statute. Instead, Article 102 of the Statute now symbolically underlines the differences between surrender and extradition.[142] It can be argued that no other solution is acceptable. States Parties which traditionally hesitate to extradite nationals may prevent their surrender by making a genuine effort to prosecute and punish them for international crimes. Their national laws invariably enable them to try nationals for serious offences regardless of whether these offences were committed on their own territory or elsewhere. On the other hand, an exception with regard to the surrender of nationals would have seriously undermined the complementary function of the Court. As far as the serving of sentences imposed by the Court (p. 1684) is concerned, by making a declaration pursuant to Article 103 of the Statute, the State of nationality may influence the likelihood that its national will be able to serve a sentence on its territory. Moreover, Article 103 already takes account of the humanitarian interests that may be promoted by enforcing a sentence in the State of nationality. On the other hand, to make this a general condition for surrendering a national might again jeopardize the Court's complementary function. The role of international immunities is discussed in another part of this commentary;[143] as far as domestic immunities are concerned, Part 9 of the Statute does not permit a State Party to refuse surrender for the reason that the person requested enjoys immunity from prosecution according to its laws.

As has been discussed earlier, many extradition laws and treaties contain provisions aiming to protect the requested person against the serious risk that his or her basic individual rights will be infringed upon by the requesting State.[144] Human rights treaties are also of increasing importance here.[145] The protection afforded may have regard to the fairness of a trial, the sentences that may be imposed or the manner in which they are executed, or still other circumstances. Articles 86 and 89 of the Statute do not allow refusal of surrender for any of these reasons. Apparently, the framers of the Statute have proceeded from the assumption that, under the Statute, individual persons do not have to fear for violations of their basic rights, and it is difficult to see that they could have proceeded on the basis of a different assumption. In the various parts of the Statute, considerable care has been taken to protect the human rights of the accused and convicted person in accordance with the provisions of human rights treaties. In this regard, I have already mentioned the provisions on arrest and provisional arrest in Parts 5 and 9 of the Statute. By ruling out the death penalty the Statute eliminates one of the main objections that many States might otherwise have made against its ratification. The same is not the case for life-long sentences, but the provisions in the Statute on that penalty will perhaps be flexible enough to enable States whose national constitution forbids the imposition of a life-long sentence, and thereby also extradition to other States without a guarantee that it will not be enforced, to become parties to it.[146] Be this as it may, Articles 86 and 89 do not permit States to raise human rights objections against the surrender of persons based on national laws and national constitutions. However, the possibility cannot be excluded altogether that the duty to surrender a person may on occasion conflict with a State Party's duty under human rights conventions not to deliver up a person, however (p. 1685) remote that possibility may seem at the present moment. With an exception for situations that have been referred to the Court by the Security Council, this conflict cannot be solved by assuming that the obligations for States Parties under the Statute take precedence over obligations arising out of other treaties.

Like the Statutes of the ad hoc Tribunals, Articles 86 and 89 of the Statute of the International Criminal Court do not permit the requested State to refuse surrender on the grounds that the person requested is being prosecuted or has been tried and convicted or acquitted by the requested State for the offence for which surrender is requested.[147] In the case of the ad hoc Tribunals, this is a consequence of the fact that, pursuant to their Statutes, the Tribunals have primacy over national courts in cases of concurrent jurisdiction. In the case of the Court, this follows from its complementary function. Once the Court has, pursuant to Article 17 of the Statute, decided that a case is admissible there is no room for refusal of surrender since the admissibility decision implies that States have shown themselves to be unwilling or unable genuinely to prosecute or punish the person requested. A different situation is the one in which the requested State is prosecuting the person requested for an offence or offences other than the one or the ones for which his surrender has been requested or is enforcing a sentence pronounced on account of them. In extradition law, this usually leads to extradition being granted but the execution of that decision being postponed. The solution chosen in Article 89 of the Statute is slightly different.[148] Pursuant to paragraph 4 of that Article, the requested State must grant the request but shall consult with the Court. The ensuing consultation will have to focus on the question of when a person should be surrendered to the Court. Finally, there is the problem of requests for surrender of the Court competing with requests made by third States for extradition for the same or other offences. Article 90 of the Statute, which is devoted to that question, will be discussed later.[149]

In extradition law, extradition is normally granted under the condition that the person whose extradition has been granted shall not be proceeded against for any offence committed prior to his surrender other than that for which he was extradited unless the State surrendering him consents. Another common condition is that the person shall not be surrendered to a third State unless the surrendering State gives his consent. Since Article 101 of the Statute offers a solution here that deviates from State practice as well as from the approach of the ad hoc Tribunals the matter deserves a more thorough and separate examination later.[150]

(p. 1686) Implicit in the foregoing is that a dispute between the Court and the requested State Party may easily arise. More often than not, the dispute will be over the right of the Court to request surrender rather than the duty of a State Party to comply with that request. For instance, the requested State may be of the opinion that the conduct for which surrender has been requested does not constitute a crime under the Statute or falls outside the Court's jurisdiction ratione loci or temporis. Or it might be unwilling to comply with a request because, in its opinion, the request has been made in a case which should be considered to be inadmissible. The normal way to solve disputes is for the requested State to enter into consultations with the Court in accordance with Article 97 of the Statute. Another avenue is to challenge the jurisdiction of the Court or the admissibility of a case in accordance with Article 19 of the Statute; most of the objections that the requested State could make against surrender seem to amount to such challenges. The important procedural question which arises in relation to challenges to the jurisdiction of the Court or the admissibility of a case is how they affect the duty of a State Party to comply with a request for surrender pending a determination of such challenges by the Court. I will discuss that question later.[151]

3. States not Parties

Being a treaty, the Statute does not impose obligations to arrest and surrender persons on States which do not wish to become Parties to it. While various provisions in the Statute may be considered to be invitations to cooperate, it is not sure that these States will respond to them. The fact that the Statute creates surrender obligations for States Parries only may, of course, seriously hamper the efficacy of the Court. The question is whether or not the consequences of States not having become Parties to the Statute might be mitigated or eliminated by obligations arising out of other treaties with regard to extradition or surrender.

It is likely that numerous bilateral and a number of multilateral extradition treaties are in force between States that have become and States that have not become Parties to the Statute. If a State not Party to the Statute is not prepared to surrender a person to the Court, a State which is a Party to the Statute might use a bilateral or multilateral extradition treaty as a basis for requesting the person's extradition for the purpose of trying him for a crime under the Statute or for any other crime. Would it, after having obtained the person's extradition, be entitled to surrender that person to the Court? That is highly unlikely. Virtually all extradition treaties contain provisions making re-extradition of the person surrendered to a third State subject to the consent of the State which has surrendered him. Notwithstanding Article 102 of the Statute, there is no reason to suppose that such clauses would not apply where surrender of persons to the Court is con(p. 1687) cerned. Before requesting surrender, the Court would, therefore, first have to turn to the third State in accordance with Article 98(2) of the Statute.[152] At most, the State Party to the Statute would be in a position to itself try the requested person for crimes under the Statute. Even this is far from certain, the main reason being that virtually all extradition treaties entitle the requested State to refuse extradition on the grounds that it itself possesses jurisdiction over the offence for which extradition has been requested and wants to exercise it. Moreover, even if the requested State does not have jurisdiction over the offence, there may be other provisions in the extradition treaty enabling it to refuse a request. Therefore, the most one can probably say is that extradition requests addressed by States Parties to the Statute to States not Parties may put considerable pressure on the latter States either to prosecute the requested person themselves or extradite him. It is not impossible that such pressure may cause the requested State to surrender the requested person to the Court instead.

The second category of treaties to look at here are the treaties with regard to international crimes discussed earlier within the framework of an analysis of the obligation of States to extradite or prosecute.[153] Of these treaties, the UN Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide and the UN Convention on the Suppression and Punishment of the Crime of Apartheid envisage the establishment of an international penal tribunal which would have jurisdiction over the crimes of genocide or apartheid. However, pursuant to Article VI of the Genocide Convention and Article V of the Apartheid Convention the fact that a State is a Party to the conventions does not automatically imply that it recognizes the jurisdiction of the penal tribunal to be created. Both articles make a separate act of acceptance necessary. States not Parties to the Rome Statute need not recognize the International Criminal Court as a tribunal within the meaning of both conventions, although Article 12 of the Statute offers them that choice. As long as they have not done so, it is not possible to construe a direct obligation for them to surrender persons to the Court on the basis of the two UN conventions. The real importance of the conventions lies elsewhere. They both obligate all Parties to punish persons who have committed crimes of genocide or apartheid on their territory. It would seem that the parties to the conventions may be considered to have complied with that obligation by accepting the jurisdiction of the Court in the case at hand and surrendering the person concerned to the Court. In this sense, the two conventions may well strengthen the position of the Court, although only experience can tell whether this will really be the case.

What is the case for the two UN conventions is also true for treaties carrying the duty for States Parties either to extradite or to prosecute the alleged offender of an (p. 1688) international crime. The relevant treaties here are the four Geneva Conventions, Protocol I Additional, and the UN Torture Convention. It is widely held that the relevant provisions of the Geneva Conventions do not exclude handing over the accused to an international criminal court whose competence has been recognized by the Contracting Parties.[154] In this approach, surrender of an accused to an international court constitutes compliance with the treaty obligation to extradite or prosecute. This point of view was shared by the International Law Commission in its 1994 Draft Statute for an International Criminal Court and applied to all treaties carrying the obligation of aut dedere aut punire.[155] It also lies at the basis of the Rome Statute, although a provision explicitly saying so has not been maintained in the final text.[156] One way of complying with the duty to extradite or prosecute arising out of a number of treaties is to become a Party to the Rome Statute and to surrender persons to the Court on the basis of its provisions. An alternative way for States that do not wish to become Parties to the Statute is to recognize the Court's jurisdiction in an individual case in accordance with Article 12 or to cooperate with the Court on the basis of Article 87. Thus, obligations arising out of treaties other than the Statute might again, in indirect ways, strengthen the position of the Court where surrender is concerned.

Finally, to the extent that the principle of aut dedere aut punire may have become a rule of customary international law it might have the same effects. There can be little doubt that customary international law imposes a primary duty on States which have themselves been implicated in international crimes to repress them. Surrender of the alleged offenders to the Court may free them from that obligation. It is, however, more open to doubt whether the obligation to extradite or prosecute has become a rule of jus cogens with regard to other States.[157]

C. Arrest and Surrender Proceedings

Provisions with regard to arrest and surrender proceedings are scattered over the Statute. Articles 58 and 60 deal with the powers of the Court to order the arrest and surrender, as well as the provisional arrest, of persons. Articles 87, 89, 91, and 92 are, wholly or partially, concerned with the contents of the Court's requests for arrest and surrender and for provisional arrest, and with the transmission of these requests to States. On the other hand, provisions on the obligation of States to give effect to the Court's requests are to be found in Articles 59, 87, 88, 89, 91, and 92. Articles 87, 88, 89, and 91 are concerned with general procedural matters. Article (p. 1689) 59 deals with the arrest of persons by States on the Court's request, Article 92 with their provisional arrest. Finally, Article 55 accords rights to individual persons during an investigation, which may be of importance to them within the framework of national proceedings with regard to arrest, provisional arrest, and surrender. In the following, I will mainly concentrate on Article 91.

Pursuant to the first paragraph of Article 90, the Court may transmit a request for the arrest and surrender of a person to any State on the territory of which that person may be found. The power to request the provisional arrest of the person by that State has been granted to the Court in Article 92. Unlike the Rules of Procedure and Evidence of the ICTY and the ICTR, the Statute does not make a distinction between (ordinary) arrest warrants and so-called 'international arrest warrants'.[158] Apparently, the framers of the Statute did not want to follow the example of the ad hoc Tribunals in creating a special procedure in the case of refusal of States to comply with requests for arrest and surrender, designed to provide some sort of compensation for the fact that trials in absentia are not allowed under the Statute.

Article 91(1) of the Statute provides that the Court's requests shall be made in writing. However, in urgent cases a request may be made by any medium capable of delivering a written record, provided that the request shall be confirmed through the channel provided for in Article 87(1)(a). That channel may be the diplomatic channel or any other appropriate channel accepted by the State Party concerned. Paragraphs (2) to (4) of Article 91 are concerned with the contents of the Court's request. Here, a distinction is made between requests for the arrest and surrender of persons who may be considered to be suspects or accused, on the one hand, and for the arrest and surrender of convicted persons, on the other.

Three requirements apply to requests for the arrest and surrender of persons pursuant to an order made by the Pre-Trial Chamber under Article 58. Two of them are simple and self-evident, the third is not. Pursuant to Article 91(2), requests must, first, be supported by information describing the person sought, sufficient to identify the person, and information as to that person's possible location. Secondly, the request must be accompanied by a copy of the warrant of arrest. The third requirement, laid down in paragraph 2(c), is that a request be supported by such documents, statements, or information as may be necessary to meet the requirements for the surrender process in the requested State. Paragraph 2(c) goes on to provide that these requirements should not be more burdensome than those applicable to requests for extradition pursuant to treaties or arrangements between the requested State and other States and should, if possible, be less burdensome, taking into account the distinct nature of the Court. The rather complicated character of this part of paragraph 2, an apparent compromise between (p. 1690) two radically different approaches, makes it understandable that paragraph 4 of the article obligates the requested State to provide, on the Court's request, information to the Court as to what its national requirements are and to give it advice on how to proceed.

Paragraph 2(c) is a compromise between different traditions in the field of extradition proceedings.[159] All States require that an extradition request be accompanied by a concise statement of the facts of the case and of the crime with which the requested person is charged, including, where possible, the time and location of the crime. The Court's requests will have to satisfy that requirement. Since similar requirements have already been laid down in Article 58(3), where the Court's warrants of arrest are concerned one may expect that few difficulties will arise here. However, there are traditional differences in approach between common-law and civil-law countries with regard to the question of whether extradition requests should be supported by evidence supporting the allegations against the person requested. Traditionally, common-law systems of justice require the production of such evidence while civil-law systems of justice do not. The basic compromise of Article 91 consists of respecting these differences in approach and allowing every State to stick to its own preferences. In this respect, there is a fundamental difference between the Statute and the Rules of Procedure and Evidence of the ICTY and the ICTR. As has been discussed earlier, these Rules have dispensed with evidentiary requirements altogether.[160] The choice of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence probably rests on the consideration that the international crimes over which the ad hoc Tribunals have jurisdiction are among the most serious crimes one can imagine and that all States have a common interest in their repression. Moreover, the argument that the ad hoc Tribunals should be trusted not to request the arrest and surrender of a person without solid reasons may also have played a role. On the other hand, the counterargument could be advanced that to arrest a person for international crimes and to surrender him to an international court are measures of such enormous consequences for the individual concerned that a procedural safeguard consisting in the production of evidence should not be eliminated.[161] It is not obvious that an international court would not be able to produce evidence in support of its requests or that this requirement would, in itself, seriously hinder it in its functioning. The main danger in maintaining the requirement is that it offers an opportunity for States unwilling to cooperate with an international court to delay compliance with that court's requests or to sabotage them.

(p. 1691) One may expect a number of States Parties to maintain evidentiary requirements. It is, therefore, important to know what evidentiary standard must be met in order for the Court to be able to issue an arrest warrant. A warrant for the arrest of a person may be issued before or after that person has become an accused, that is before or after the confirmation of the charges against a person by the Pre-Trial Chamber in accordance with Article 61 of the Statute. Pursuant to Article 61(5), the standard for confirmation of the charges is whether there is sufficient evidence to establish substantial grounds to believe that a person committed the crime charged. The standard for the issuance of an arrest warrant is lower. Pursuant to Article 58(1), the Pre-Trial Chamber may issue a warrant for the arrest of a person if there are reasonable grounds to believe that the person has committed a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court.[162] It is not possible here to assess in abstracto whether this standard is equivalent to national evidentiary standards with regard to the arrest of persons in legal systems that require the production of evidence in support of extradition requests. Neither is it of decisive importance what the answers would be. What matters is whether or not the evidence produced by the Court in support of its request for a person's arrest and surrender in the case at hand satisfies domestic standards of the requested State. If these standards are more exacting than the one laid down in Article 58 of the Statute, the Court would need more evidence than is required by Article 58 before it could address a request for the arrest of a person to the State concerned.

In the Report of the Preparatory Committee on the Establishment of an International Court submitted to the Rome Conference, it was provided that evidentiary standards applied by the requested State with regard to the Court's requests should in no event be more burdensome than those applicable to requests for extradition pursuant to treaties with other States.[163] The final text of Article 91(2)(c) of the Statute has retained the idea and added some new elements. Obviously, the purpose of paragraph 2(c) is to reduce the importance of evidentiary requirements. The factual supposition behind the paragraph probably is that some States, while maintaining evidentiary requirements in their domestic extradition statutes, have abolished them in treaties they have concluded with other States. The perfect theoretical example would be a State which has dropped evidentiary requirements in all extradition treaties or agreements it has concluded with other States but wants to maintain them where it is prepared to extradite a person to another State without a treaty having been concluded between them. It is possible that such States do exist and in their case paragraph 2(c) makes sense. However, another development in extradition law and practice with regard to evidentiary requirements seems to be far more important. Some common-law countries which have traditionally required the production of evidence are now (p. 1692) prepared to eliminate that requirement in their treaty relations with some States while still clinging to it in those with other States.[164] A clause in Article 91 similar to a most-favoured-nation clause could have considerably reduced the importance of evidentiary requirements here. But that is not what the literal text of paragraph 2(c) contains. Read literally, the paragraph seems to leave States which require the production of evidence in some treaties, but not in other treaties, free to determine whether or not they will apply the requirement to the Court's requests. However, it could be argued that a State which has abolished evidentiary requirements in one or more extradition treaties will not be able to explain why it is not possible to adopt with regard to the Court's request requirements that are 'less burdensome' than those in other extradition treaties, 'taking into account the distinct nature of the Court'.

Paragraph 3 of Article 91 is concerned with the contents of request for the arrest and surrender of persons who have already been convicted by the Court. There is no need to comment on its provisions.

D. Provisional Arrest

Article 92 empowers the Court to request the provisional arrest of a person pending the presentation of the request for surrender and the documents supporting that request. Unlike the Rules of Procedure and Evidence of the ICTY and the ICTR, the Statute does not confer the power to make requests on the Prosecutor. The Court may make such requests in 'urgent cases'. In conformity with existing extradition practice these words must be understood to require that the purpose of a request for arrest and surrender will be frustrated or jeopardized if the arrest of the person would have to await the arrival of that request and the accompanying documents in the requested State. What purposes may be served by an arrest warrant is stated in Article 58(1). The likelihood or possibility that these purposes would be frustrated if the person's arrest would be delayed entitles the Court to demand his provisional arrest. Paragraph 5 of Article 58 makes explicit that provisional arrest can only be requested on the basis of an existing warrant of arrest issued by the Court pursuant to paragraph 1. In this respect, the Statute again differs from the Rules of Procedure and Evidence of the ICTY and the ICTR; Rule 40 empowers the Prosecutor to request any State to arrest a suspect and place him in custody without an arrest warrant having been issued by a chamber of the Tribunal.

Pursuant to paragraph 2 of Article 92, requests for provisional arrest shall be made by any medium capable of delivering a written record. Moreover, the paragraph (p. 1693) sums up the information that should accompany the request. The most important difference with a request for arrest and surrender is that a request for a person's provisional arrest need not be accompanied by evidence supporting the allegation that the person has committed one or more crimes. In all these respects, paragraph 2 reflects existing practices in extradition law.

Virtually all extradition treaties which enable the requesting State to make a request for the provisional arrest of a person allow the requested State to release the person if a formal extradition request has not been received within a prescribed period. Many treaties also make his release mandatory after another period has passed. The system adopted in Rule 40 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence of the ICTY and the ICTR is atypical: the Rule does not specify any period within which action of some sort must have been taken by the Prosecutor in furtherance of the proceedings. Paragraph 3 of Article 92 of the Statute follows current practices in extradition law. It provides that the requested State may release the person if that State has not received the request for surrender and the accompanying documents within a certain time limit. It is left to the Rules of Procedure and Evidence of the Court to determine that period; the time limit chosen in Rule 188 of the Draft Rules is sixty days. In State practice, these time limits vary considerably, geographical distances still playing an important role here. The UN Model Treaty on Extradition suggests a period of forty days,[165] the Draft Statute for an International Criminal Court of the International Law Commission envisaged a period of four weeks. Paragraph 3 of Article 92 goes on to provide that, within the time limit to be determined by the Rules of Procedure and Evidence, the person provisionally arrested may consent to his surrender if permitted by the law of the requested State. The requested State shall then proceed to surrender the person as soon as possible. Finally, paragraph 4 follows extradition practices in yet another respect. It provides that the fact that the person provisionally arrested has been released shall not prejudice his subsequent arrest and surrender if the request for surrender and the documents supporting it are delivered at a later date.

E. Cooperation, Jurisdiction, and Admissibility

Pursuant to Article 18 of the Statute, States Parties as well as private individuals may challenge the jurisdiction of the Court or the admissibility of a case. The question to be discussed here is how a challenge affects the duty of States Parties to arrest and surrender persons pending the determination of the challenge by the Court. Paragraphs 7 to 9 of Article 18 are concerned with the suspensive effects of challenges in general. Articles 89(2), and 90(2) to (5), provide for additional rules with regard to the arrest and surrender of persons. Here, I will limit my discussion (p. 1694) of the system of the Statute to Articles 18 and 89. Article 90, which is concerned with competing requests, will be discussed later.[166]

Article 89(2) of the Statute provides that if the person whose arrest and surrender have been requested by the Court brings a challenge before a national court on the basis of the principle of ne bis in idem as provided in Article 20, the requested State shall immediately consult with the Court to determine if there has been a relevant ruling on admissibility. If the case is admissible, the requested State must proceed with the execution of the request. If an admissibility ruling is pending, the requested State may postpone the execution of the request for surrender until the Court makes a determination of admissibility. It follows a contrario from paragraph 2 that the execution of requests for arrest of the person may not be postponed.[167]

Paragraph 2 of Article 89 is only concerned with one situation in which a challenge to the admissibility of a case has been made. In this regard, it differs from Article 95, which provides that any challenge to admissibility of a case entitles the requested State to postpone the execution of requests for other forms of cooperation pending a determination by the Court. Pursuant to Article 18 of the Statute, challenges to the admissibility of a case may also be made by other persons who have been accused or for whom an arrest or a summons to appear has been issued in the same case. It may also happen that challenges have been made by a State which has jurisdiction over the case or the State from which acceptance of jurisdiction is required under Article 12. This State need not necessarily be the State to which the Court's request for arrest and surrender has been addressed. Moreover, it may happen that the challenge is not to the admissibility of the case but to the jurisdiction of the Court, or to both the jurisdiction of the Court and the admissibility of the case. Article 89 gives no answer to the question of what the obligations of States Parties are with regard to the execution of requests for arrest and surrender pending the determination of these challenges. That answer

Paragraph 9 of Article 19 provides that the making of a challenge shall not affect the validity of any order or warrant issued by the Court prior to the making of the challenge. Warrants for arrest and surrender issued prior to the making of a challenge must, therefore, be executed.

On the other hand, Article 19 does not rule out any action with regard to the arrest of a person after a challenge has been made and pending its determination by the Court. While, pursuant to paragraph 7, the Prosecutor must, as a general rule, suspend the investigation pending the determination of a challenge made by a State, paragraph 8 permits him to take a limited number of initiatives with the (p. 1695) authority of the Court. One of these is to prevent the absconding of persons in respect of which the Prosecutor has already requested a warrant of arrest from the Pre-Trial Chamber under Article 58. Paragraph 8(c) adds that the Prosecutor must act '[I]n cooperation with the relevant States'. In assessing the meaning of paragraph 8 one must take into account that, pursuant to Parts 5 and 9 of the Statute, the power to order arrest and surrender of persons and to request States to execute warrants lies entirely with the Court; no powers have been given to the Prosecutor in this respect. One may conclude that, although the Prosecutor may invite or request States Parties to arrest a person in order to prevent his absconding, paragraph 8 of Article 19 does not create an obligation for States to comply with the invitation or request. It also seems to follow from paragraphs 8 and 9 that, pending the determination of a challenge, the Court may not issue a warrant for the arrest of a person in order to prevent his absconding.

F. Competing Requests

In Article 90, the Statute addresses the problem of a request for surrender of a person to the Court competing with a request for the extradition of the same person made by another State. Article 90 is only concerned with competing requests addressed to States Parties to the Statute. It does not attempt to give rules with regard to States not Parties which face the choice of either satisfying the Court's request or giving priority to an extradition request emanating from another State. A distinction is made in the article between competing requests with regard to the same and other conduct. In all situations of competing requests, the first paragraph of Article 90 requires the State Party to notify the Court of that fact.

1. The Same Conduct

It may happen that the Court's request for the surrender of a person addressed to a State Party coincides in time with the request for the extradition of the same person for the same conduct made by another State. That other State may be a Party to the Statute itself or it may not have become a Party to it. In the first situation, paragraphs 2 and 3 of Article 90 apply, in the second situation paragraphs 4 to 6.

The main rule with regard to concurrence of requests for surrender and extradition requests emanating from other States Parties is that the requested State shall give priority to requests from the Court. However, the fact that the role of the Court is complementary to that of national courts makes a detailed set of rules necessary. In this regard, paragraph 2 provides that the requested State shall give priority to the Court's request if the Court has, pursuant to Articles 18 and 19 of the Statute, made a determination that the case in respect of which surrender is sought is admissible. However, this determination must have taken into account the investigation or prosecution conducted by the requesting State in respect of the conduct to which the Court's request for surrender relates. Given the Court's (p. 1696) complementary role this is a logical restriction. Pursuant to paragraph 2, priority to the Court's request must also be given if the Court makes a similar determination after having been notified by the requested State that it has received a request for the extradition of the person. Finally, paragraph 3 is concerned with the situation in which a determination of admissibility is pending. The requested State may then make a decision on the extradition request but it must postpone the execution of a decision to extradite the person until the Court has determined that the case is inadmissible. Paragraph 3 obligates the Court to make its determination on an expedited basis.

Pursuant to paragraphs 4 to 6, a different set of rules applies with regard to extradition requests emanating from States not Parties. The basic distinction here is whether or not the requested State Party 'is under an international obligation to extradite the person to the requesting State not Party to this Statute'. This will not be the case if no international agreement has been concluded between the two States creating reciprocal duties to extradite persons for international crimes over which the Court has jurisdiction. Extradition merely on the basis of a national statute is an example. But the formula quoted also seems to cover the situation in which an international agreement on the extradition of persons is in force between the two States but does not create an obligation to extradite the person requested in the case at hand. This may, for instance, be due to the fact that the person requested possesses the nationality of the requested State or the fact that the offence for which extradition has been requested is punishable by death under the law of the requesting State.

Paragraphs 4 and 5 are concerned with the situation in which there is no international obligation for the requested State Party to extradite the person. Pursuant to paragraph 4, the requested State must give priority to the Court's request if the Court has determined that the case is admissible. On the other hand, paragraph 5 permits the requested State to proceed to deal with the extradition request if no such determination has been made. Rather surprisingly, both paragraphs are silent on the situation in which a determination of admissibility is pending. It seems that a reasonable interpretation of the Statute would require the requested State to await the Court's decision.[168]

Paragraph 6 deals with the situation in which the requested State Party is obligated to extradite the person pursuant to an existing international obligation. It requires the requested State to make a choice between the Court's request and that of the requesting State taking all relevant factors into account. Among them, the paragraph mentions the respective dates of the requests, the interests of the requesting State (including the place of commission of the crime and the nationality of the person requested), and the possibility of subsequent surrender between the Court (p. 1697) and the requesting State. This provision raises a number of questions. The first is whether paragraph 6 may be applied at all in the relationship between the requested and the requesting State. For the requesting State, Article 90 of the Statute may appear to be a res inter alios acta, which cannot be invoked against it. The requesting State may well take the point of view that conflicting treaty obligations should not be decided by Article 90 of the Statute but by the ordinary rules of international law in the matter. Meanwhile, almost all extradition treaties contain provisions on concurring extradition requests which enable the requested State to make a choice between the various requests. More often than not, these provisions indicate criteria on which to base the decision; as a matter of fact, the criteria of paragraph 6 are largely inspired by these provisions.[169] This will usually enable the requested State to give priority to the Court's request, not by applying paragraph 6 directly but by taking this paragraph into account in applying provisions in extradition treaties on competing requests or by simply applying the relevant treaty provisions.[170] The requesting State might perhaps object that surrender of a person to the Court cannot be equated with extradition within the meaning of an extradition treaty, and it might even point at Article 102 of the Statute for support of its view. However, notwithstanding Article 102, surrender of a person to the Court and extradition of a person to another State have in common that the person is removed from the jurisdiction of the requested State to another jurisdiction for the purpose of standing trial for a criminal offence or of serving a sentence on account of that offence. For the application of extradition treaties this is all that matters. While, therefore, the conclusion may be that most existing extradition treaties do not create serious problems where the surrender of persons to the Court is concerned, matters are different with regard to other types of international agreements which may necessitate the requested State to hand over a person, agreements on the status of military forces in particular. They usually provide for the exclusive or primary jurisdiction of the sending State over criminal offences committed by a member of its forces, in particular offences committed in the performance of official duty, coupled with the obligation of the receiving State to hand over that member to the competent authorities of the sending State.[171] Moreover, international immunities may also play a role here.[172]

(p. 1698) It may happen that the Court rules a case to be inadmissible following a notification of the requested State that it has received a request for surrender from the Court as well as an extradition request from another State. Pursuant to paragraph 8 of Article 90, the requested State Party must notify the Court of any subsequent refusal to extradite the person to that State. The ratio of this provision probably is that the Court may have declared a case inadmissible for the very reason that the State requesting extradition is investigating or prosecuting the case. Refusal of extradition places that State in a position in which it is no longer able effectively to prosecute the person requested. This may cause the Court to revise its admissibility decision.[173]

2. Other Conduct

The second situation envisaged by Article 90 is that in which the Court's request coincides in time with an extradition request for conduct other than that for which the Court seeks the person's surrender. Here, paragraph 7 simply distinguishes between the situation in which there is an international obligation for the requested State Party to extradite the person and that in which such an obligation does not exist. In the latter case, priority must be given to the Court's request. In the first case, it is up to the requested State to make a choice on the basis of criteria similar to those of paragraph 6. Surprisingly, the requested State may also make that choice in a situation in which the Court's request concerns a case that has been declared admissible and the extradition request emanates from another State Party. Finally, paragraph 8 applies.

G. Speciality

In extradition practice, extradition is normally granted under the condition that the requested person will not be detained, tried, or punished by the requesting State for any offence committed prior to his surrender other than that with regard to which the requested State has consented to his extradition. This is known as the rule of speciality, or specialty. The purpose of the rule is to enforce other rules of extradition law. Limitations and restrictions laid down in extradition treaties or extradition statutes would make little sense if the requesting State, after having obtained a person's surrender, would be able to detain, try, or punish the person for offences for which his extradition has been refused or for offences for which his extradition had not been requested. The rule of speciality does not prevent the requesting State from legally altering the charge for which the person was extradited in the course of proceedings, provided that the offence under the new legal description is based on the same set of facts contained in the extradition requests and its supporting documents. Finally, the rule is not absolute in the sense that the (p. 1699) requested State may, after the person's surrender, at the request of the other State consent to the person being detained, tried, or punished for offences other than that for which his extradition has been granted.

In the relationship between the two ad hoc Tribunals and the Member States of the United Nations the rule of speciality does not apply. There is no mention of the rule in the Statutes of the Tribunals. Moreover, in Prosecutor v. Kovačević, the Appeals Chamber of the ICTY held that there is no reason to apply the rule given the fact that the fundamental relations between the requested and requesting State in extradition law have no counterpart in the arrangements relating to the International Tribunal.[174] The decision is perfectly logical. Since, under the Statutes of the ad hoc Tribunals, States cannot refuse transfer of a suspect or accused for any reason whatsoever, the rule of speciality makes no sense in the relationship between the Tribunals and States. It cannot serve any legitimate purpose.

The Rome Statute does not follow the example of the ad hoc Tribunals but State practice in the field of extradition. Article 101(1) of the Statute provides that a person surrendered to the Court shall not be proceeded against, punished, or detained for any conduct committed prior to surrender other than the conduct or course of conduct which forms the basis of the crimes for which that person has been surrendered. Pursuant to paragraph 2, the Court may request a waiver of the requirement of paragraph 1 from the State which surrendered the person. If necessary, the Court shall provide additional information in accordance with Article 91. Finally, States Parties shall have the authority to provide a waiver to the Court and should endeavour to do so. Clearly, an obligation to provide a waiver has not been imposed on the States Parties.

A provision on the speciality rule was already included in the Draft Statute for an International Criminal Court of the International Law Commission. In the structure of the Draft, ratification of the Statute by a State did not automatically imply that that State accepted the Court's jurisdiction. Article 22 of the Draft made it possible for States to ratify the Statute without accepting the Court's jurisdiction or to accept its jurisdiction over some crimes but not over others, the crime of genocide being the sole exception. Pursuant to Article 53 of the Draft, an unconditional obligation to transfer a person to the Court only existed to the extent a State had accepted the Court's jurisdiction. In this structure, the rule of speciality had a function similar to the one it fulfils in extradition law. The rule, laid down in Article 55 of the Draft, prevented the Court from trying a person for crimes with respect to which the State having transferred him did not accept the Court's jurisdiction.

(p. 1700) One of the fundamental differences between the International Law Commission's Draft and the Rome Statute is that the Statute does not make a distinction between ratifying it and accepting the Court's jurisdiction. Ratification of the Statute automatically implies acceptance of the Court's jurisdiction over all offences under the Statute. Given this fact, the question is what sensible purpose the speciality rule could still serve in the relationship between the Court and States Parties. I believe the answer is: none.[175] As has been discussed, under the Statute States Parties have assumed an unconditional obligation to surrender persons to the Court. In this respect, the legal situation is no different from that under the Statutes of the ad hoc Tribunals. It is, of course, possible that 'the investigation of a person who has been surrendered to the Court for a specific crime [leads] to discovery of evidence that the surrendered person has also committed another crime or that the evidence for the crime for which the person was surrendered, while insufficient for conviction, is sufficient for a lesser crime'.[176] However, the rule of speciality does not forbid the conviction for a lesser offence if that conviction is based on the same set of facts. More importantly, there cannot be any justification at all for applying the rule of speciality in the situation in which a State would have been obligated to surrender the person had the Court been in a position to request his surrender for a crime for which it wants to try the person in addition to the crime with respect to which it has already obtained the person's surrender. It may, of course, be that the State Party objects to the person being tried for a new offence, for instance because it is of the opinion that the case is inadmissible. However, the proper way for a State Party to submit its objections to the Court in that event is to challenge the jurisdiction of the Court or the admissibility of the case in accordance with Article 19 of the Statute. There is, therefore, no need for the speciality rule in the relations between States Parties and the Court. The fact that the rule has nevertheless been incorporated in the Statute can only frustrate the efficacy of the Court, since it indirectly undermines the obligation of States Parties to surrender persons to the Court and provides them with an opportunity to block the prosecution of crimes without good reason. One wonders why Article 101 has been included in the Statute. Perhaps this is not only due to the absence of a clear conception of what the rule of speciality is about. It may also be that the drafters of the Statute have overlooked the fact that the rule had a distinct and legitimate purpose in the International Law Commission's Draft which it no longer has in the Rome Statute.

(p. 1701) Matters are different with regard to States not Parties. Article 101 also applies to the relationship between these States and the Court. A State not Party which has accepted the jurisdiction of the Court in individual cases on the basis of Article 12 of the Statute or which is prepared to cooperate with the Court on the basis of Article 87 may well object to the person surrendered being tried for offences which are not covered by the agreement on the basis of which it is prepared to surrender persons to the Court. However, this could also be spelled out in the agreement between that State and the Court. There is no special need to include a provision in the Statute itself with regard to the matter.

It is normal for extradition treaties and extradition statutes to contain provisions forbidding the requested State to re-extradite the person requested to a third State without the consent of the State which has extradited him. Article 101 of the Statute is silent on the matter.[177] Apparently, it is not within the mandate of the Court to provide assistance to third States in trying offences other than crimes under the Statute. Meanwhile, Rule 185, paragraph 1, of the Draft Rules of Procedure and Evidence of July 2000 provides that a person who has been surrendered to the Court and is subsequently released from custody shall, as a rule, not be transferred to a State which has requested his or her extradition unless the original surrendering State consents. In addition, paragraph 2 of the same Rule allows the person's transfer to a State whose investigation or prosecution has formed the basis of a successful challenge to admissibility, unless the State that originally surrendered the person requests his or her return. Thus, transfer of a person to a third State for the purpose of being prosecuted or punished by that State still depends on the consent of the surrendering State. However, as is apparent from Article 108 of the Statute, the same is not the case for extradition of a person to a third State by a State that has enforced a sentence of the Court and on whose territory the sentenced person remains after having served that sentence.

H. An Assessment

At the end of the discussion of Articles 89 to 92 and 101 to 102 of the Statute, it may be useful to evaluate the system of arrest and surrender and briefly to assess its strengths and weaknesses.

As far as matters of substance are concerned, I have already noted that the major achievement of the Statute is that the duty of States Parties to surrender persons to the Court has not been made subject to any of the limitations and exceptions which are common in extradition law. In this regard, there are no fundamental differences with the legal situation under the Statutes of the ad hoc Tribunals.

(p. 1702) Basically, by ratifying the Statute a State voluntarily accepts the same obligations as are imposed on it by the resolutions of the Security Council creating the ad hoc Tribunals. There is, however, one major and regrettable exception. The rule of speciality should not have been included in the Statute. An imperfection of lesser importance in Article 90 of the Statute is that it offers States Parties too much discretion in the choice, of whether they will surrender a person to the Court or try him for conduct other than the crime with regard to which the Court has requested his surrender. Apart from these points, the basic and inevitable weakness of the Rome Statute with regard to arrest and surrender does not lie in its contents but in the fact that it is a treaty. By definition, it cannot impose obligations with regard to surrender on States which do not wish to become parties to it. As has been shown, obligations arising out of other treaties for States not Parties to the Statute may put some pressure on them to deliver up persons to the Court, but it remains to be seen how strong this effect will be. The unwillingness of a number of States to ratify the Statute may, moreover, have negative consequences for the ability of other States willing to ratify it to surrender persons to the Court, as is apparent from the provisions in the Statute on competing requests.

Procedural matters in the field of surrender are only partially the subject of this contribution to the Commentary. The main issue here is the problem of evidentiary requirements. The Statute differs fundamentally from the Rules of Procedure and Evidence of the ad hoc Tribunals in that it leaves States Parties free to require that a request for arrest and surrender be supported by evidentiary material. Without any doubt, this will complicate the work of the Court. But I am not convinced that there cannot be any reasonable justification for maintaining the requirement where surrender of persons to the Court is concerned. The main drawback of the system of the Statute probably is that some States Parties may use the requirement as a means to frustrate cooperation with the Court. Another major difference between the Statute and the Rules of Procedure and Evidence lies in the respective rules with regard to provisional arrest. From the point of view of protecting basic rights of individual persons, the system of the Statute is definitely superior to that of Rule 40 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence. Finally, a short remark should be made with regard to the effects of challenges to the jurisdiction of the Court or to the admissibility of a case on the obligation to arrest and surrender persons. One may argue that Article 19 of the Statute puts too rigorous restrictions on the authority of the Court to request cooperation pending the determination of a challenge. In my opinion, it would have been preferable to grant the Court more discretionary powers here.

[19] Both UN resolutions have been the subject of judicial decisions. In 1957, the US Court of Appeals held that the resolutions had not sufficient force of law to modify long-standing judicial interpretation of provisions in extradition treaties with regard to political offences; Karadzole v. Artukovic, 247 F.2d 198, 204–205 (9th Cir.). On the other hand, on 6 October 1983, the French Cour de Cassation invoked Resolution 3(I) in ruling that the expulsion of Barbie from Bolivia to France did not amount to disguised extradition contrary to French law; Fédération Nationale des Déportés et Internés Résistants et Patriotes and Others v. Barbie, 78 ILR (1988) 125, 131. A similar ruling was given by the Buenos Aires Court of First Instance in the case of Jan Durcansky; see Green, supra note 15, at 347 Find it in your Library.

[22] Already in 1880 and 1892 the Institut de Droit International recommended that acts of violence committed during civil wars or civil uprisings should nor be regarded as political offences if they amounted to acts of odious barbarity or vandalism forbidden by the laws of war (Resolutions adopted at the 1880 Oxford session and the 1892 Geneva session; cf. Van den Wyngaert, supra note 15, at 142 Find it in your Library). The point of view expressed by the Institut was developed further in the case law of the courts in many States, while it was sometimes incorporated in national extradition statutes in as many words (cf. Art. 5 of the French Extradition Act of 1927). As has been discussed already, during World War II the Allied governments made it clear to neutral States that they did not expect them to refuse extradition of persons accused of war crimes on the ground that the acts alleged amounted to political offences.

52 Somewhat similar provisions may be found in several resolutions on the punishment of war criminals and persons committing crimes against humanity adopted by the General Assembly of the United Nations during the years 1969–1973. Thus, Res. 2583 (XXIV) calls upon all States concerned to take the necessary measures for the extradition of war criminals and persons guilty of crimes against humanity, while in Res. 2721 (XXV) it is said that all States should take measures in accordance with recognized principles of international law to arrest such persons and extradite them to the countries where they have committed these crimes. Res. 2840 (XXVI) again urges States to take measures to ensure the extradition of persons suspected of war crimes or crimes against humanity, adding that a refusal to cooperate in the arrest, extradition, trial, and punishment of these persons is contrary to the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations and to generally recognized norms of international law. Finally, Res. 3074 (XXXVIII) declares that States shall assist each other in arresting and bringing to trial perpetrators of war crimes or crimes against humanity and that States shall not take any legislative or other measures which may be prejudicial to the international obligations they have assumed in regard to their arrest, extradition, and punishment. 75 Basically, Rules 40 and 40 bis of the ICTR's RPE adopt the same approach. In the agreements concluded between the USA and the Tribunals, the USA agrees to surrender persons who have been indicted. In case of urgency, however, provisional arrest may be requested.

76 Morris and Scharf, supra note 70, Vol. I, p. 207 Find it in your Library.

[77] The term 'surrender' is used only in Rule 58 in relation to the obligations of States. It is, moreover, used in Rule 60 with regard to the voluntary appearance of the accused before the Tribunal.

[78] Another terminological problem concerns the distinction between requests and orders in Arts. 29 and 28. Since it is irrelevant for the duty of States to cooperate whether a request has been made or an order has been issued by a tribunal, I will refrain from discussing the matter.

[120] Cf. e.g. Art. VII(5)(a) of the 1951 NATO Status of Forces Agreement, which uses the expression 'handing over'.

[121] Art. 228 of the Versailles Treaty and the Geneva Conventions designate the process as the 'handing over' of persons. The Moscow Declaration speaks of sending them back, Art. IV of the Allied Control Council Law No. 10 of their delivery.

[123] Pursuant to its Art. 227, the former German emperor would have to be 'surrendered' by The Netherlands. However, the German text of Art. 227 uses the word 'ausliefern'.

PRESS RELEASE Nº 002/2012

ON THE DECISIONS OF PRE-TRIAL CHAMBER I OF THE INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL COURT (ICC) PURSUANT TO ARTICLE 87(7) OF THE ROME STATUTE ON THE ALLEGED FAILURE BY THE REPUBLIC OF CHAD AND THE REPUBLIC OF MALAWI TO COMPLY WITH THE COOPERATION REQUESTS ISSUED BY THE COURT WITH RESPECT TO THE ARREST AND SURRENDER OF PRESIDENT OMAR HASSAN AL BASHIR OF THE REPUBLIC OF THE SUDAN

Addis Ababa, 9 January 2012 - The African Union Commission has noted with grave concern the decisions ICC-02/05-01/09-139 and ICC-02/05-01/09-140 of 12 and 13 December 2011, respectively, of Pre-Trial Chamber I of the International Court (ICC) on the alleged failure of the Republic of Malawi and the Republic of Chad to comply with the cooperation requests issued by the ICC with respect to the arrest and surrender of President Omar Al Bashir of the Republic of Sudan.

In its decision on Malawi, and mutatis mutandis on Chad, the Chamber asserts to have found,

> 'in accordance with article 87(7) of the Rome Statute, that the Republic of Malawi has failed to comply with the cooperation requests contrary to the provisions of the Statute and has thereby prevented the Court from exercising its functions and powers under this Statute. The Chamber decides to refer the matter both to the United Nations Security Council and to the Assembly of States Parties.'

With respect to the immunity of Heads of State in relation to requests for arrest and surrender, the Chamber noted that > "there is an inherent tension between articles 27(2) and 98(1) of the Statute and the role immunity plays when the Court seeks cooperation regarding the arrest of a Head of State. The Chamber considers that Malawi, and by extension the African Union, are not entitled to rely on article 98(1) of the Statute to justify refusing to comply with the Cooperation Requests."

Following these Decisions of ICC Pre-Trial Chamber I, the African Union Commission expresses its deep regret that the decision has the effect of:

(i) Purporting to change customary international law in relation to immunity ratione personae;
(ii) Rendering Article 98 of the Rome Statute redundant, non-operational and meaningless;
(iii) Making a decision per incuriam by referring to decisions of the African Union while grossly ignoring the provisions of Article 23 (2) of the Constitutive Act of the African Union, to which Chad and Malawi are State Parties, and which obligate all AU Member States "to comply with the decisions and policies of the Union".

In this regard, the AU Commission wishes to point out that Article 27(2) of the Statute provides that "Immunities or special procedural rules which may attach to the official capacity of a person, whether under national or international law, shall not bar the Court from exercising its jurisdiction over such a person". However, this Article 27 appears under the part of the Statute setting out 'general principles of criminal law' and applies only in the relationship between the Court and the suspect. In the relationship between the Court and states, article 98(1) applies. This Article provides: "The Court may not proceed with a request for surrender or assistance which would require the requested State to act inconsistently with its obligations under international law with respect to the State or diplomatic immunity of a person or property of a third State, unless the Court can first obtain the cooperation of that third State for the waiver of the immunity".

As a general matter, the immunities provided for by international law apply not only to proceedings in foreign domestic courts but also to international tribunals: states cannot contract out of their international legal obligations vis-à-vis third states by establishing an international tribunal. Indeed, contrary to the assertion of the ICC Pre-Trial Chamber I, article 98(1) was included in the Rome Statute establishing the ICC out of recognition that the Statute is not capable of removing an immunity which international law grants to the officials of States that are not parties to the Rome Statute. This is because immunities of State officials are rights of the State concerned and a treaty only binds parties to the treaty. A treaty may not deprive non-party States of rights which they ordinarily possess. In this regard, it is to be recalled that the immunity accorded to senior serving officials, ratione personae, from foreign domestic criminal jurisdiction (and from arrest) is absolute and applies even when the official is accused of committing an international crime. The International Court of Justice (ICJ) made this clear in the Arrest Warrant Case (Democratic Republic of Congo v. Belgium). The ICJ stated that "it has been unable to deduce . . . that there exists under customary international law any form of exception to the rule according immunity from criminal jurisdiction and inviolability to incumbent Ministers for Foreign Affairs, where they are suspected of having committed war crimes or crimes against humanity."

The Security Council has not lifted President Bashir's immunity either; any such lifting should have been explicit, mere referral of a "situation" by the UNSC to the ICC or requesting a state to cooperate with the ICC cannot be interpreted as lifting immunities granted under international law. The consequence of the referral is that the Rome Statute, including article 98, is applicable to the situation in Darfur.

Additionally, the African Union Commission expresses its total disagreement with the decisions of the Pre-Trial Chamber I which did not take cognisance whatsoever of the obligations of AU Member states arising from Article 23 (2) of the Constitutive Act of the African Union, to which Chad and Malawi are State Parties, and which obligate all AU Member States "to comply with the decisions and policies of the Union". Moreover, by decision Assembly/AU/Dec. 245(XIII) adopted by the 13th Ordinary Session of the Assembly of Heads of State and Government, the Assembly "Decide[d] that in view of the fact that the request by the African Union has never been acted upon (by UN Security Council), the AU Member States shall not cooperate pursuant to the provisions of Article 98 of the Rome Statute of the ICC relating to immunities, for the arrest and surrender of President Omar El Bashir of The Sudan". This decision adopted by the AU policy organs pursuant to the provisions of Rule 33 of the Rules of Procedure of the Assembly is binding on Chad and Malawi and it would be wrong to seek to coerce them to violate or disregard their obligations to the African Union.

The African Union Commission recalls that by virtue of their membership of the African Union, Chad and Malawi, and indeed all other African States parties to the Constitutive Act, have committed themselves under Article 4 of the Constitutive Act to "condemnation and rejection of impunity" and voluntarily negotiated the Rome Statute and joined the ICC with a view to enhancing the fight against impunity. Indeed, all Member States of the then Organization of African Unity were party to the adoption of decision CM/Dec.399 (LXVII) during the 67th Ordinary Session of the Council of Ministers held in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia from 25 to 28 February 1998, urging all Member States to support and participate in the Rome Process, along with a representative of the OAU General Secretariat, in the firm belief that the proposed international Criminal Court would be a unique and independent mechanism in the fight against impunity.

The African Union will continue to fight against impunity as required by Article 4 of the Constitutive Act and the relevant Assembly decisions and shall oppose any ill-considered, self-serving decisions of the ICC as well as any pretensions or double standards that become evident from the investigations, prosecutions and decisions by the ICC relating to situations in Africa. Indeed, the African Union believes that the fight against impunity is too important to be left to the ICC alone.

The African Union believes that issues of peace and justice should be addressed comprehensively and in a holistic manner and will continue to pursue in respect of The Sudan the interconnected, mutually interdependent and equally desirable objectives of peace, justice and reconciliation. It also requests all African Union Member States and Friends of Africa to reject any draft resolution that may be tabled before the UN Security Council as well as the Assembly of the States Parties to the Rome Statute with the intention of sanctioning the Republic of Malawi and Chad.

The Immunity Provision in the AU Amendment Protocol

Separating the (Doctrinal) Wheat from the (Normative) Chaff

Dire Tladi*

Abstract

In July 2014, the African Union adopted a new Protocol amending the Protocol on the African Court. In doing so it included a provision stating that certain state officials shall be immune from prosecution during their tenure of office. This article discusses whether the immunity provision is a reflection of customary international law or whether, on the contrary, it violates international law and undermines the Statute of the International Criminal Court.

1. Statement of the Issues

In July 2014, the African Union (AU) adopted a Protocol amending the Protocol on the African Court ('Amendment Protocol'),[1] and included a provision on immunity for certain state officials.[2] The hero-villain trend so characteristic of the international criminal justice debate is clearly on show in the disagreement concerning the immunities provision of the Amendment Protocol.[3] While the AU has consistently viewed its position on immunities as reflective of customary international law, those opposed to the Amendment Protocol and the inclusion of immunities have argued that that it is inconsistent with international law or, at best, undermines the Statute of the International Criminal Court (ICC).[4]

Tladi, 'When Elephants Collide it is the Grass that Suffers: Cooperation and the Security Council in the Context of the AU/ICC Dynamic', 7 African Journal of Legal Studies (2014) 381, at 381 where the author described debates on the ICC-AU relationship as being 'characterised by an ideological chasm that has pitted villains against protagonists — with both sides casting the other villains intent on wanton destruction and themselves as protagonists fighting the good fight.'

[4] See e.g. J. Njeri Kariri, 'Can the New African Court Truly Deliver Justice for Serious Crimes?', ISS Toady, 8 July 2014, available online at www.issafrica.org (visited 7 October 2014).

As with much of the debate related to international criminal justice, and the ICC in particular, especially in relation to the latter's relationship with Africa, much of the positions on both sides of the divide ignore the nuances of what is a complex area of law. In the jockeying for positions, the line between doctrinal positions and normative policy assertions become blurred (and sometimes disappear altogether). The doctrinal question whether immunities of certain officials before international courts is consistent with modern international law is very often answered by the normative policy postulation that the AU should not have included the immunities provision in the Amendment Protocol. Conversely, the normative postulation questioning the wisdom of prosecuting heads of state is met by a reference to a provision in the ICC Statute. Added to the mix is very often an empirical assertion, either that a position will result in impunity or will lead to the destabilization of a country or region. Further complicating the discourse is the resort by commentators to the political rationale or objective behind the Amendment Protocol, i.e. an assertion, not necessarily untrue, that the Amendment Protocol, and the immunity provision in particular, is a response to the prosecutions of African heads of state by the ICC.[5] However, whatever the motives of the AU in adopting the Amendment Protocol, any evaluation of the instrument and its provisions must be done on its merit, unclouded by the political considerations that gave rise to the instrument.[6] This is to say, the instrument cannot be contrary to international law just because the motives of its creators were less than angelic.

The purpose of this article is to try to synthesize from the mixture of normative, doctrinal and empirical positions often advanced in favour of preserving or excluding immunities in the Amendment Protocol, the position under international law. At the outset, [5] See for an assessment A. Abass, 'The Proposed Criminal Jurisdiction for the African Court: Some Problematical Aspects', 60 Netherlands International Law Review (2013) 27-50.

[6] At any rate Abass, supra note 5, at 42 et seq. argues that it is overly simplistic to suggest that the Amendment Protocol was adopted only to respond to the ICC, pointing to, inter alia, the desire of the AU to ensure an African trial for Hissène Habré as a contributing factor independent of the ICC. See also A. Abass, 'Prosecuting International Crimes in Africa: Rationale, Prospects and Challenges', 24 European Journal of International Law (2013) 933-946, at 935 who says: 'The pervasive, but arguably erroneous assumption is that Africa began prospecting for international criminal jurisdiction after and as a consequence of the fall out over the Al Bashir arrest warrant.' The AU's concern for what it termed the abuse of the principle of universal jurisdiction may similarly also be advanced as a reason for the AU's pursuit of criminal jurisdiction for the African Court. See e.g. § 9 of AU Decision on the Implementation of the Assembly Decision on the Abuse of the Principle of Universal Jurisdiction, Assembly/AU/Dec.213 (XII), which requested the Commission to 'examine the implications of the [African] Court being empowered to try international crimes such as genocide, crimes against humanity and war crimes.' It is however, difficult to deny that the ICC-AU tension was, at the very least, an impetus for the speedy finalisation of the Amendment Protocol. See e.g. § 10(iv) AU Decision on Africa's Relationship with the International Criminal Court (ICC), Ext/Assembly/AU/Dec.1 (October 2013) in which the AU, after lamenting ICC responses to the AU's concerns, decides to 'fast track the process of expanding the mandate of the African Court on Human and Peoples' Rights (AfCHPR) to try international crimes, such as genocide, crimes against humanity and war crimes.'

and in order to exclude it from the analysis altogether, I wish to state, upfront, my normative policy position: The decision of the AU to provide for the immunity of officials sends out wrong signals about its commitment to the fight against impunity. Devoid of this normative policy question, this paper seeks to place the immunity provision of the Amendment Protocol in context of international law, including the ICC Statute. I begin in the next section by describing the various arguments that have been made both in support of the provision and in opposition to it. I then, in the section that follows, provide an evaluation of the immunities clause in the context of the international law and in light of the arguments that have been made, both in support and opposition. Finally, I offer some concluding remarks.

2. Immunity before the African Court: Unpacking the Case for and Against

A. Scope of Immunity in the Amendment Protocol

Before addressing some of the issues that have been raised, concerning the immunity provision in the Amendment Protocol, it is useful to set out the provision and attempt to identify its scope. Article 46A*bis* of the Amendment Protocol provides as follows:

> No charges shall be commenced or continued against any serving AU Head of State or Government, or anybody acting or entitled to act in such capacity, or other senior state officials based on their functions, during their tenure of office.

As a preliminary point, irrespective of the broader legal issues pertaining to immunity under international law, the text of Article 46A*bis* is ambiguous and not well drafted.[7] Firstly, , the meaning of the phrase 'or anybody … entitled to act in such capacity', which first appeared in the decision of the AU Extraordinary Summit of October 2014,[8] is unclear. A broad interpretation of the phrase could refer to any number of persons including potentially all ministers and even all members of parliament in some states.[9] At its narrowest, the provision could mean a deputy Head of State or Government.[10] The former interpretation, being dependent on the constitutional system of each state, is inherently relative and would result in

[7] See Njeri Kariri, supra note 4.
[8] Paragraph 10(i) of the Decision on Africa's Relationship with the International Criminal Court (ICC), supra note 6.
[9] Section 90 of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996, provides that the Deputy President, a Minister designated by the President, a Minister designated by other members of the cabinet, the Speaker of Parliament until the parliament designates one of its members, may act as Head of State.
[10] Under Sec. 147(3) of the Constitution of Kenya, only the Deputy President may hold the office of the acting President in the absence of the President. See also Art. II Section 6 of the Constitution of the United States.

different rules being applicable to officials from different states. The latter, narrower, interpretation is more objective and thus more consistent with the objective of the decision in which the phrase first appeared, i.e. to prevent the prosecution of Kenya's Head of State and his deputy. Admittedly there might be a fair degree of uncertainty in general international law itself regarding the beneficiaries of immunities. For example much has been made of the fact that the International Court of Justice (ICJ) in the Arrest Warrant case, in addressing the question of immunities of Ministers for Foreign Affairs, described 'certain holders of high ranking office in a state' in an illustrative rather than an exhaustive list.[11] However, the ambiguity of the ICJ approach to the list of officials entitled to immunities may be somewhat overstated. First, it is not clear that in its oft-cited proposition, the ICJ was referring specifically to persons entitled to immunity ratione personae since the ICJ only speaks of immunities for these office bearers, which could include immunity ratione materiae.[12] Moreover, the International Law Commission (ILC) has seemingly adopted a compromise by deciding that only the troika (Head of State, Head of Government and Minister for Foreign Affairs) enjoy immunity ratione personae.[13] At any rate, it is unnecessary to resolve the conceptual issue of who enjoys immunity under general international law for the purposes of this article since this interesting conceptual discussion does not affect the doctrinal question at issue. It need only be said that the ambiguity in Article 46A*bis* does not result from conceptual uncertainty but rather from drafting difficulties. The choice of interpretation, broad or narrow, does not affect the doctrinal issue discussed below.

The second ambiguity relates to whether Article 46A*bis* aims at providing two different regimes of immunity i.e. immunity ratione personae and immunity ratione [11] The ICJ, in addressing the question of whether Ministers for Foreign Affairs benefit from immunity, stated 'certain holders of high-ranking office in a State, such as the Head of State, Head of Government and Minister for Foreign Affairs enjoy immunities from jurisdiction in other States, both civil and criminal.' (emphasis added). See ICJ, Case Concerning the Arrest Warrant of 11 April 2000 (Democratic Republic of the Congo v. Belgium), Judgement of 14 February 2002, ICJ Reports (2002) 3, § 53.

[12] Ibid. It is interesting to note, in this regard, that the ICJ compared the immunities it was referring to, to those enjoyed by diplomatic and consular officials. While the former may be said to enjoy immunity ratione personae, the latter clearly only enjoy immunity for acts performed in official capacity.

[13] At its 65th Session, in the context of its work on Immunity of State Officials from Foreign Criminal Jurisdiction, the ILC adopted Draft Arts 3 and 4 on immunity ratione personae as covering all acts, whether in private or official capacity, performed by Heads of State, Heads of Government and Ministers for Foreign Affairs; see Chapter 5 of the Report of the International Law Commission on the Work of its Sixty-Fifth Session (6 May to 7 June and 8 July to 9 August 2013) General Assembly Official Records Sixty-Eighth Session, Supplement 10 (A/68/10). This is a compromise approach because some within the Commission, including the author, were of the view that, notwithstanding the Arrest Warrant case neither the logic of immunity ratione personae or state practice justified extending that type of immunity to Ministers for Foreign. Also see infra note 17.

materiae, or only one.[14] Moreover, if the aim is to establish only one regime, it would be unclear whether the regime would be immunity ratione materiae or immunity ratione personae. An ordinary meaning of Article 46A*bis* appears to support two separate categories.[15] The first category, approximating immunity ratione personae, would be applicable to 'Heads of State or Government' and 'anybody acting or entitled to act in such capacity'. The second category, approximating immunity ratione materiae, would apply to 'other senior officials based on their functions'. The phrase, 'based on their functions' in Article 46A*bis,* appears to only qualify 'other senior officials' and not 'Heads of State or Government, or anybody acting or entitled to act in such capacity'. An interpretation of Article 46A*bis* as establishing two categories of immunities would also be consistent with applicable principles of international law.[16] Assuming this interpretation were the more correct interpretation, it would mean that, contrary to the conclusions of the ILC and the ICJ decision in the Arrest Warrant case, immunity ratione personae under the Statute of the African Court would not be extended to Ministers for Foreign Affairs.[17]

An alternative interpretation of Article 46A*bis* is that it establishes only immunity ratione personae. Under such an interpretation, the qualifier 'based on their functions' does not qualify the extent of immunity but rather forms part of the description of the senior officials. In other words, senior officials, defined in terms of their functions, enjoy the same type of immunity of Heads of State or Governments and other anyone acting or entitled in [14] See Chapter 5 of the Report of the International Law Commission on the Work of its Sixty-Fifth Session (6 May to 7 June and 8 July to 9 August 2013) General Assembly Official Records Sixty-Eighth Session, Supplement 10 (A/68/10). At its 66th Session, in the context of its work on Immunity of State Officials from Foreign Criminal Jurisdiction, the ILC adopted Draft Article 5 on immunity ratione materiae as applicable to state officials acting as such. See Chapter 9 of the Report of the International Law Commission on the Work of its Sixty-Sixth Session (5 May to 6 June and 7 July to 8 August 2014), General Assembly Official Records Sixty-Ninth Session, Supplement 10 (A/69/10).

[15] The general rule on interpretation of treaties, in Art. 31(1) of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties (VCLT), requires the terms of a treaty to be given their ordinary meaning in context and in the light of the treaty's object and purpose.

[16] Under the Vienna rules of interpretation, in particular Art. 31(3)(c) VCLT, 'relevant rules of international law applicable in the relations between the parties' are to be taken into account in the interpretation of treaties. On the notion of two categories of immunities under international law, see the work of the ILC, supra note 14.

[17] See ICJ Arrest Warrant case, supra note 11, § 54 where the Court held that Ministers for Foreign Affairs enjoy immunity ratione personae. Whether Ministers for Foreign Affairs should enjoy immunity ratione personae was a matter of intense debate during the ILC's consideration of the topic. Although the ILC decided to include Ministers for Foreign Affairs, at § 5 of the Commentary to Draft Art. 3, the ILC states as follows: 'On the one hand, some members of the Commission pointed out that the Court's judgment [in the Arrest Warrant case] was not sufficient grounds for concluding that a customary rule existed, as it did not contain a thorough analysis of the practice and that several judges expressed opinions that differed from the majority view. One member of the Commission who considered that the Court's judgment does not that there is a customary rule nevertheless said that, in view of the fact that Court's judgement in that case had not been opposed by States, the absence of a customary rule does not prevent the Commission from including [Minister for Foreign] among the persons enjoying immunity ratione personae.'

that capacity. Indeed the phrase 'based on their functions' appears to have been drawn from the ICJ's reasoning for extending immunity ratione personae to Ministers for Foreign Affairs in the Arrest Warrant case.[18] This interpretation is supported mainly by the fact that in its earlier decisions leading to the adoption of Article 46A*bis*, the AU has never made a distinction between the immunities of heads of state and those of other senior state officials.[19] Moreover, such an interpretation would resolve the inconsistency between the first interpretation and the ICJ decision relating to Ministers for Foreign Affairs. Although Article 46A*bis* could be read as establishing two categories of immunities, namely immunity ratione materiae and immunity ratione personae, on a balance it appears that this second alternative is more convincing. Under this interpretation, however, other officials whose functions do not exhibit the characteristics identified by the Court in the Arrest Warrant case as indicating immunity ratione personae would not have immunity before the African Court's criminal law section. Finally, consistent with the Arrest Warrant case, the immunity, being immunity ratione personae, may be relied upon only while the individual in question holds the relevant office.[20]

B. Arguments on the Immunity Provisions in the Amendment Protocol

As a normative proposition, arguments against the immunity provision in the Amendment Protocol are numerous and are often based on the fight against impunity. However, as a doctrinal question, arguments against the immunity provisions in the amendment protocol have tended to revolve around its consistency with international law and the ICC Statute in particular. Jemima Njeri Kariri, for example, puts forward primarily normative arguments against the immunity provision. She observes that the immunity provision is a 'setback to advancing democracy and the rule of law' and provides a 'protective veil that denies justice to victims and is detrimental to accountability'.[21] These are arguments that suggest that the African Union should not have included the immunity provision. Although not focused on the legal doctrinal question about the place of immunity in international (and domestic) law, [18] In the ICJ Arrest Warrant case, supra note 11, at § 53, the Court states that to determine the extent of the immunities of Ministers for Foreign Affairs it 'must first consider the nature of the functions exercised by a Minister for Foreign Affairs'.

[19] See e.g. § 9 of the Decision on Africa's Relationship with the International Criminal Court (ICC), Ext/Assembly/AU/Dec.1 (Oct 2013).

[20] See § 61 of the ICJ Arrest Warrant case, supra note 11. See also Draft Art. 4(1) of the ILC's preliminary Draft Articles on the Immunity of State Officials, supra note 14. See especially § 2 of the commentary to Draft Art. 4.

[21] Njeri Kariri, supra note 7.

Njeri Kariri postulates, as a legal position, that 'the immunity provision flouts international law and is contrary to the national laws of African states like Kenya and South Africa'.[22]

The doctrinal argument, questioning the legal basis of an immunity provision in the Amendment Protocol can be illustrated by reference to Chacha Bhoke Murungu's observations on the African Court.[23] Murungu asserts, citing Article 27 of the ICC Statute, that 'immunity of state officials is no longer a valid defence for the commission of international crimes'.'[24] This position is also one that appears to have been advanced by the ICC in its decisions in the Malawi and Chad non-cooperation cases.[25] More to the point, Murungu asks whether extending the jurisdiction of the African Court to cover ICC-crimes (along with Article 46A*bis*) 'has a legal basis under the ICC Statute'.[26] The ICC Statute, he asserts, 'does not expressly allow or even imply that regional courts … be conferred with jurisdiction' over ICC-crimes.[27] On the basis of his analysis he concludes that 'it is difficult to establish a clear legal basis' for extending the jurisdiction of the African Court in the ICC Statute.[28] Indeed, Murungu suggests that the very process of establishing the criminal section of the African Court was 'contrary to the provisions of the ICC Statute' in relation to cooperation.[29] Murungu's critique of the extension of jurisdiction of the African Court is based on the issues of immunity of African heads of state raised by the AU. He states, for example, that the only purpose behind the AU's attempts to expand the jurisdiction of the African Court is to 'protect some of its leaders'.[30]

The arguments of Murungu are reflective of the whispers in the corridors of ICC meetings, even if not always captured in the literature. These arguments can be reduced to three related propositions. First, customary international law does not provide for immunity of officials before international courts. Second, the provision of immunity in Article 46A*bis* is inconsistent with international law or, at best, goes against the trend of practice. Finally,

Article 46A*bis* undermines the ICC Statute. These legal propositions about immunity for ICC-crimes are often based on statements about the effect of immunity on the fight against impunity. The granting of immunity is said to be contrary to the AU commitment to protecting the sanctity of life and condemning and rejecting impunity.[31] Steven Lamony of the Coalition for the International Criminal Court is quoted as saying 'Africa should be moving forward in the fight against impunity, not regressing'.[32] Similarly Netsanet Belay of Amnesty International has said that the decision 'undermines the integrity of the African Court'.[33]

The AU itself has defended the need for immunities both on normative and doctrinal grounds. While, in the specific context of the arrest and surrender of Al Bashir, the AU has based its arguments on the related duty of African states parties to respect the immunities of the Sudanese President consistent with Article 98 of the ICC Statute,[34] the AU has also made broader argument concerning immunities before international tribunals as well.[35] According to a recent decision of the AU, under customary international law, 'Heads of State and other senior state officials are granted immunities during their tenure of office'.[36] Further, this decision does not limit the application of these immunities to domestic courts. Indeed, addressing the consequences of the customary international law position, the decision declares that 'no charges shall be commenced or continued before any International Court or Tribunal against any serving AU Head of State or Government'.[37] As a doctrinal proposition and more explicitly, the AU has maintained that 'immunities provided for by international law apply not only to proceedings in foreign domestic courts but also to international tribunals', and that states cannot circumvent its obligations in this regard 'by establishing an international tribunal'.[38] To provide for immunities of heads of state and other officials in the Amendment Protocol, is therefore, from the AU's perspective, is to act in furtherance of international law.

The AU does not dispute the legality of arrangements such as those in Article 27 of the ICC Statute, which provides that neither immunity nor other special procedural rules attaching to the official capacity of a person constitute a bar for the ICC exercising jurisdiction over an individual.[39] The AU, instead, approaches Article 27 as a treaty rule applicable only to state parties and that for non-state parties, the rules of customary international law relating to immunities remain intact. In response to the decisions of the ICC on non-cooperation by Malawi and Chad, the AU issued a press release which stated, in part, that: 'immunities of State officials are rights of the State concerned and a treaty only binds parties to the treaty. A treaty may not deprive non-Party States of rights which they ordinarily possess.'[40] This position essentially presents Article 27 ICC Statute, and similar provisions in the statutes of other international tribunals, as exceptions to the rules of customary international law relating to immunities and applying only as between parties to the constitutive treaties. The immunities provision in the Amendment Protocol are, from this perspective, seen not only as acceptable but as reflecting customary international law. This has been the legal basis of the AU's call for non-cooperation with the ICC's call for the arrest and surrender of Al Bashir.[41] According to the AU, Article 27 leaves intact customary international law on immunities and the waiver of immunities implied by Article 27 applies only between states parties to the ICC Statute. Thus while there may be a duty on states

[39] Art. 27(1) ICCSt. states that the 'Statute shall apply equally to all persons without distinction any distinction based on official capacity. In particular, official capacity as a Head of State or Government, member of a Government … shall in no case exempt a person from criminal responsibility under this Statute, nor shall it, in and of itself, constitute a ground for reduction of sentence.' Art. 27(2) provides that '[I]mmunities or special procedural rules which may attach to the official capacity of a person, whether under national or international law, shall not bar the Court from exercising jurisdiction over such a person'.

[40] AU Commission Press Release 02/2012, supra note 38.

[41] In its first decision on non-cooperation with respect to Omar Al Bashir, for example, the AU Summit requests the Commission and African states to engage in a process to clarify 'the Immunities of officials whose States are not party to the [Rome] Statute.' See § 8 of the AU Decision on the Meeting of African States Parties to the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (ICC), Assembly/AU/Dec. 245(XIII) Rev. 1. See especially § 6 of the AU Decision on the Progress Report of the Commission on the Implementation of the Assembly Decisions on the International Criminal Court (ICC), Assembly/AU/Dec.397 (XVIII) in which the AU Assembly reaffirms 'its understanding that Article 98(1) was included in the Rome Statute … out of a recognition that the Statute is not capable of removing an immunity which international law grants to officials of States that are not parties to the Rome Statute'.

parties to the ICC to cooperate in the arrest and surrender of a head of a state party no such a duty exists in relation to the arrest and surrender of a head of non-state party.[42] While this aspect is slightly tangential to the consideration of Article 46A*bis* of the Amendment Protocol, it does serve to illustrate the AU's understanding of immunities under customary international law and, more to the point, the perceived exceptionality of Article 27 of the ICC Statute.

Both the positions supporting the immunities provision and the position opposing immunities are based on doctrinal assumptions about the rules of general international law relating to immunities. I turn now to evaluate these doctrinal assumptions.

3. Evaluating the Doctrinal Argument Concerning the Immunity Provision

For convenience sake, I begin with an evaluation of the AU's argument on immunities. It is difficult to argue with the AU's assertion that that duty on States Parties to cooperate with the ICC cannot deprive non-states parties of their rights under customary international law. Treaties create rights and obligations only as between parties to the treaty and the rights of non-parties cannot be affected by the treaty.[43] Whether this means, as is argued by the AU, that there is no duty to cooperate in the arrest and surrender of Al Bashir is dependent on other legal questions, such the effect of a Security Council referral of a situation to the ICC and the interpretation of Article 98, both of which fall beyond the scope of the enquiry here.[44]

While the assertion that the rights relating to immunities under customary international law of a non-state party cannot be affected by the duty to cooperate under the ICC Statute cannot be disputed, what does require closer scrutiny is the assertion that under customary international law heads of state (and other officials entitled to immunity) enjoy immunity before international courts and tribunals. This assertion seems to ignore the ICJ dictum in Arrest Warrant where the Court stated that, notwithstanding the customary international law rules on immunity of officials from foreign criminal jurisdiction, a state official may still be prosecuted before an international court under certain circumstances.[45]

[42] See AU Commission Press Release 20/2012, supra note 38.
[43] See generally Art. 34 VCLT.
[44] This aspect of the immunities debate has been considered in various articles. See e.g. D. Akande, 'The Legal Nature of the Security Council Referrals to the ICC and its Impact on Bashir's Immunities', 7 JICJ (2009) 333-352 and P. Gaeta, 'Does President Al Bashir Enjoy Immunity from Arrest?' 7 JICJ (2009) 315-332. See also Tladi, supra note 34.
[45] ICJ, Arrest Warrant case, supra note 11, at § 61.

But there is a far more fundamental problem with the AU's postulation. The immunity of states officials, whether ratione personae or ratione materiae, under customary international law means, in essence, the immunity of state official from the jurisdiction of courts of foreign states. This immunity is an extension of the immunity of the state from the jurisdiction of other states based on the principle of sovereign equality of states.[46] International tribunals, like the ICC and the African Court, are not foreign states. The rationale for immunity of states and its officials — sovereign equality of states — does not apply to the exercise of jurisdiction of international courts and tribunals since, thought created by states, they are not themselves states. In contrast, the AU has asserted that to hold that rules on immunities do not apply to proceeding before international courts would be allow to states to circumvent their obligations under international law by creating an international tribunal.[47] This argument might be applicable in the case of a tribunal created by a handful of states which exercise control over it. However, it is unconvincing when applied to a court having 122 states parties none of which can exercise control over its decisions.[48] Moreover, since the immunity of officials from the jurisdiction of the courts of foreign states can be shown to exist in the practice of states accepted as law, to extend this immunity to cover also proceedings before international courts and tribunals would require evidence of practice of states accepted as law, which does not exist.[49] Quite the contrary, if anything given the history of international criminal law adumbrated in, for example, the ICC decisions in Malawi and Chad, there appears to be practice going in the other direction i.e. towards excluding immunity.[50] Therefore, the AU argument that the insertion of Article 46A*bis* is not only consistent with, but is reflective of, customary international law is doctrinally flawed.

Does the fact that there is no rule under customary international law granting immunity to state officials before international criminal courts and tribunals mean, at the same time, that there is a rule denying them immunity? This was essentially the argument

[46] See e.g., § 6 of the commentary to Draft Art. 4 of the ILC's Draft Articles on the Immunity of State Officials from Foreign Criminal Jurisdiction, supra note 14.
[47] See AU Commission Press Release 20/2012, supra note 38.
[48] For the suggestion that the ICC is indeed controlled by a few states see Statement by Ambassador Macharia Kamau, Permanent Representative of the Republic of Kenya on the Report of the ICC, 69th Session of the UN General Assembly, 30 October 2014 (on file with the author) urging the ICC to 'unshackle itself from a pernicious group of countries' whose control ensures that the Court 'represents [their] moral, ethical and, most disturbingly political values'. These countries, the statement continues, has a 'proprietorship' over the ICC.
[49] In this regard, the ICJ in the Arrest Warrant case, supra note 11, at §§ 58 and 59, where the Court makes it clear that the rules relating jurisdiction of national courts, including immunities applicable before them, should be distinguished from the same relating to international courts.
[50] ICC, Malawi decision, supra note 25, at § 23 et seq.

advanced in Malawi and Chad.[51] The experience with the Nuremburg Tribunal, the Tokyo Tribunal, the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia, the International Criminal for Rwanda, the Special Court for Sierra Leone and the Lebanon Tribunal constitutes practice of a denial of immunity. However, to transform the empirical fact — practice in the language of international law — to a rule of customary international law requires that the practice be accompanied by a sense of obligation, or opinio iuris.[52] No evidence of such an acceptance of law is present in relation to immunity of state officials before international courts and tribunals and none is presented by the ICC Pre-Trial Chamber in Malawi and Chad. Indeed, in the debate over the arrest and surrender of Al Bashir, those arguing that there was indeed a duty to arrest have advanced as a legal reason not the fact that the court was an international court but rather that the situation was referred to the ICC by the Security Council, which, the argument goes, has the power to override customary international law.[53]

Proponents of the view that there is a rule under customary international law denying immunity before international courts and tribunals may point to Arrest Warrant, where the ICJ [54] famously made the following observations:

> immunities enjoyed under international law by an [official] do not represent a bar to criminal prosecution in certain instances. …. Fourthly, an [official enjoying immunity in national courts] may be subject to criminal proceedings before certain international criminal courts, [sic] where they have jurisdiction.[55]

It bears mentioning that nothing in the quoted extract remotely suggests that anything about the status of immunities before international courts under customary international law. The ICJ was not here laying down a rule of international law but referring to possible avenues that may be followed for the prosecution of officials with immunity if certain conditions were met. The first avenue provided by the ICJ, for example, refers to the possibility of a person being tried before the courts of their own state.[56] Yet this can only happen if the national court in question has jurisdiction and the official in question has no immunity under domestic law. Similarly, an international court or tribunal can only try an individual if there is no jurisdictional bar, including immunity, to trying the individual. Whether or not the international court or tribunal will have jurisdiction and whether or not there is a bar to the exercise of such jurisdiction will be dependent on the constitutive instrument establishing such a court or tribunal.[57] The argument that customary international law denies immunity before international courts is, therefore, unconvincing.

That there is no legal rule under customary international law denying immunity to state officials does not, of course, mean that a state official can plead immunity before a tribunal having jurisdiction which, by its constitutive instrument, has removed immunity such as Article 27 of the ICC Statute.[58] By the same token, however, the exclusion of immunity in a treaty establishing an international court or tribunal does not affect the relationship between a non-state party to the treaty and states parties. Thus, the fact that a state is party to the ICC Statute does not imply that such a state is no longer obliged to respect the immunity of an official from a state that is not a party to the Statute. Indeed even if the assertion that customary international law excludes immunities in respect of proceedings before international courts were correct — and I have argued that it is not — this would apply only as between the state official appearing before the court and the international court or tribunal concerned and would not, by itself, affect the relationship between states inter se.[59]

If neither the AU argument that customary international law requires international courts to respect immunity nor the argument advanced by, inter alia, the ICC that customary international law denies immunity before international courts is correct, then how is Article 46A*bis* of the Amendment Protocol to be understood from the perspective of customary international law? If customary international law neither requires nor precludes the immunity before international courts and tribunals, then as matter of law the AU is free to include or exclude immunities as a bar to prosecution as it deems fit. This is consistent with the proposition made above that the existence or not of immunities before international courts and tribunals is dependent not on rules of customary international law but rather on the constitutive instrument establishing the court or tribunal. Whether the incorporation of immunities in an instrument establishing an international court or tribunal is desirable or not is a different question. Thus Article 46A*bis* is neither reflective of nor inconsistent with customary international law. The question may well be asked whether, under a treaty that is [57] See ibid. where the ICJ refers to the constitutive instruments establishing the ICC, the ICTY and the ICTR.

[58] Ibid.
[59] In the context of the ICCSt., this distinction is explained in Tladi, supra note 44, at 211 noting that Art. 27 'applies to defences, substantive or jurisdictional, that an individual may raise before the ICC. It does not, in any way, address the relationship between states nor does it address the relationship between the ICC and states parties.' (emphasis in the original).

silent on immunities, state officials are entitled to claim immunities. Subject to the normal rules of interpretation, a court, national or international, having jurisdiction is entitled to exercise that jurisdiction unless there is a rule of international law prohibiting such exercise. This is not the same as saying, however, that there is a rule of international law excluding immunity.

A related question is whether Article 46A*bis* of the Amendment Protocol undermines the fight against impunity. The argument on which this is based appears to be that the extension of the African Court's jurisdiction to international crimes while also expressly including immunity will shield perpetrators from the reaches of justice. However, this argument does not follow. The effect of the extension of the African Court's jurisdiction is, potentially, to expand the reach of international criminal justice. It does not, as the argument may suggest, reduce this reach. Assuming African states that are not party to the ICC Statute become party to the expanded African Court, then the reach of the international courts to potential situations and perpetrators becomes enlarged. On the other hand, regardless of the number of states that fall within the jurisdiction of the expanded African Court, the reach of the ICC will remain unaffected.

The idea that Article 46A*bis* of the Amendment Protocol affects the reach of international criminal justice can only be based on a misconstruction of the relationship between the AU Court and the ICC. Under Article 46A*bis* the African Court will not have the competence to try the persons having immunity but this will not prevent the ICC from exercising jurisdiction against such persons if it has jurisdiction. Under the principle of complementarity, the ICC is of course barred from proceedings with trials where a court with competence is willing and able to exercise jurisdiction.[60] This procedural bar, however, applies only to state prosecutions and/or investigations and does not extend to the exercise of jurisdiction by regional courts. Although an amendment to the ICC Statute, to recognize the competence of regional courts for the purposes of complementarity has been transmitted to the Secretary-General by Kenya,[61] this amendment is unlikely to be adopted by the Assembly

[60] See Arts 17, 18 and 19 ICCSt.

[61] See ICC Working Group on Amendments Informal Compilation of Proposals to Amend the Rome Statute (on file with the author). It should be noted, that the Kenyan proposal only seeks to amend the Preambular paragraph relating to complementarity and does not address the substantive provisions in Arts 17, 18 and 19. As currently drafted, it is therefore unlikely to be sufficient to establish a complementarity role for the African Court. See also Note Verbale 560/2014 from the Permanent Mission of Kenya to the United Nations to the President of the Assembly of States Parties detailing the amendment proposals it submitted for consideration.

of States Parties. At any rate, until such a time as an amendment has been passed, from the perspective of the ICC, Article 46A*bis* should be a non-issue.

4. Conclusion

The expansion of the jurisdiction of the AU Court to include also international crimes has raised much controversy in international criminal justice circles — both diplomatic and academic. Even more controversial has been the decision by the AU to make provision for immunities of certain officials before the AU Court in the form Article 46A*bis*. In the back and forth of arguments for and against Article 46A*bis*, normative policy arguments, empirical statements and doctrinal arguments have been lumped together in a way that can result in confusion. This confusion has aided in the perpetuation of the hero-villain trend in which supporters of the ICC see themselves as heroes and the AU as villains and the supporters of the AU see themselves as heroes and the ICC as villains.

In the eagerness to put on the white hat and fight the evil other, basic principles of international law are conveniently covered in a heap of rhetoric and slightly bent doctrine. Much of the confusion created by the debate arises from the failure by commentators to make a distinction between the law relating to immunity and the wisdom (or desirability) of Article 46A*bis*. Supporters of Article 46A*bis* present it as salvaging international law and reclaiming the foundational international principle of sovereignty by preserving immunity. What is ignored in this narrative is that international law rules on immunity apply to the exercise of jurisdiction by domestic courts over officials of a foreign state and that customary international law neither requires immunity before international courts nor prevents it. Opponents of Article 46A*bis*, on the other hand, present it as doing harm to the fight against impunity by protecting officials from the reach of international courts. What is ignored is that the expansion of the jurisdiction of the African Court does not, in any way, affect the jurisdiction of other courts, including the ICC, and can in no way prevent the exercise of jurisdiction by those courts over individuals who may be immune from prosecution before the African Court by virtue of Article 46A*bis*.

THE COURT,

composed as above,

after deliberation,

delivers the following Judgment:

1. On 17 October 2000 the Democratic Republic of the Congo (hereinafter referred to as "the Congo") filed in the Registry of the Court an Application instituting proceedings against the Kingdom of Belgium (hereinafter referred to as "Belgium") in respect of a dispute concerning an "international arrest warrant issued on 11 April 2000 by a Belgian investigating judge . . . against the Minister for Foreign Affairs in office of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, Mr. Abdulaye Yerodia Ndombasi".

In that Application the Congo contended that Belgium had violated the "principle that a State may not exercise its authority on the territory of another State", the "principle of sovereign equality among all Members of the United Nations, as laid down in Article 2, paragraph 1, of the Charter of the United Nations", as well as "the diplomatic immunity of the Minister for Foreign Affairs of a sovereign State, as recognized by the jurisprudence of the Court and following from Article 41, paragraph 2, of the Vienna Convention of 18 April 1961 on Diplomatic Relations".

In order to found the Court's jurisdiction the Congo invoked in the aforementioned Application the fact that "Belgium ha[d] accepted the jurisdiction of the Court and, in so far as may be required, the [aforementioned] Application signifie[d] acceptance of that jurisdiction by the Democratic Republic of the Congo".

2. Pursuant to Article 40, paragraph 2, of the Statute, the Application was forthwith communicated to the Government of Belgium by the Registrar; and, in accordance with paragraph 3 of that Article, all States entitled to appear before the Court were notified of the Application.

3. Since the Court included upon the Bench no judge of the nationality of either of the Parties, each Party proceeded to exercise the right conferred by Article 31, paragraph 3, of the Statute to choose a judge ad hoc to sit in the case; the Congo chose Mr. Sayeman Bula-Bula, and Belgium Ms Christine Van den Wyngaert.

4. On 17 October 2000, the day on which the Application was filed, the Government of the Congo also filed in the Registry of the Court a request for the indication of a provisional measure based on Article 41 of the Statute of the Court. At the hearings on that request, Belgium, for its part, asked that the case be removed from the List.

By Order of 8 December 2000 the Court, on the one hand, rejected Belgium's request that the case be removed from the List and, on the other, held that the circumstances, as they then presented themselves to the Court, were not such as to require the exercise of its power under Article 41 of the Statute to indicate provisional measures. In the same Order, the Court also held that "it [was] desirable that the issues before the Court should be determined as soon as possible" and that "it [was] therefore appropriate to ensure that a decision on the Congo's Application be reached with all expedition"

5. By Order of 13 December 2000, the President of the Court, taking account of the agreement of the Parties as expressed at a meeting held with their Agents on 8 December 2000, fixed time-limits for the filing of a Memorial by the Congo and of a Counter-Memorial by Belgium, addressing both issues of jurisdiction and admissibility and the merits. By Orders of 14 March 2001 and 12 April 2001, these time-limits, taking account of the reasons given by the Congo and the agreement of the Parties, were successively extended. The Memorial of the Congo was filed on 16 May 2001 within the time-limit thus finally prescribed.

6. By Order of 27 June 2001, the Court, on the one hand, rejected a request

by Belgium for authorization, in derogation from the previous Orders of the President of the Court, to submit preliminary objections involving suspension of the proceedings on the merits and, on the other, extended the time-limit prescribed in the Order of 12 April 2001 for the filing by Belgium of a Counter-Memorial addressing both questions of jurisdiction and admissibility and the merits. The Counter-Memorial of Belgium was filed on 28 September 2001 within the time-limit thus extended.

7. Pursuant to Article 53, paragraph 2, of the Rules, the Court, after ascertaining the views of the Parties, decided that copies of the pleadings and documents annexed would be made available to the public at the opening of the oral proceedings.

8. Public hearings were held from 15 to 19 October 2001, at which the Court heard the oral arguments and replies of:

For the Congo: H.E. Mr. Jacques Masangu-a-Mwanza,
H.E. Mr. Ngele Masudi,
Maître Kosisaka Kombe,
Mr. François Rigaux,
Ms Monique Chemillier-Gendreau,
Mr. Pierre d'Argent.

For Belgium: Mr. Jan Devadder,
Mr. Daniel Bethlehem,
Mr. Eric David.

9. At the hearings, Members of the Court put questions to Belgium, to which replies were given orally or in writing, in accordance with Article 61, paragraph 4, of the Rules of Court. The Congo provided its written comments on the reply that was given in writing to one of these questions, pursuant to Article 72 of the Rules of Court.

10. In its Application, the Congo formulated the decision requested in the following terms:

> "The Court is requested to declare that the Kingdom of Belgium shall annul the international arrest warrant issued on 11 April 2000 by a Belgian investigating judge, Mr. Vandermeersch, of the Brussels Tribunal de première instance against the Minister for Foreign Affairs in office of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, Mr. Abdulaye Yerodia Ndombasi, seeking his provisional detention pending a request for extradition to Belgium for alleged crimes constituting 'serious violations of international humanitarian law', that warrant having been circulated by the judge to all States, including the Democratic Republic of the Congo, which received it on 12 July 2000."

11. In the course of the written proceedings, the following submissions were presented by the Parties:

On behalf of the Government of the Congo,

in the Memorial:

> "In light of the facts and arguments set out above, the Government of the Democratic Republic of the Congo requests the Court to adjudge and declare that:

1. by issuing and internationally circulating the arrest warrant of 11 April 2000 against Mr. Abdulaye Yerodia Ndombasi, Belgium committed a violation in regard to the DRC of the rule of customary international law concerning the absolute inviolability and immunity from criminal process of incumbent foreign ministers;
2. a formal finding by the Court of the unlawfulness of that act constitutes an appropriate form of satisfaction, providing reparation for the consequent moral injury to the DRC;
3. the violation of international law underlying the issue and international circulation of the arrest warrant of 11 April 2000 precludes any State, including Belgium, from executing it;
4. Belgium shall be required to recall and cancel the arrest warrant of 11 April 2000 and to inform the foreign authorities to whom the warrant was circulated that, following the Court's Judgment, Belgium renounces its request for their co-operation in executing the unlawful warrant."

On behalf of the Government of Belgium,

in the Counter-Memorial:

"For the reasons stated in Part II of this Counter-Memorial, Belgium requests the Court, as a preliminary matter, to adjudge and declare that the Court lacks jurisdiction in this case and/or that the application by the Democratic Republic of the Congo against Belgium is inadmissible.

If, contrary to the preceding submission, the Court concludes that it does have jurisdiction in this case and that the application by the Democratic Republic of the Congo is admissible, Belgium requests the Court to reject the submissions of the Democratic Republic of the Congo on the merits of the case and to dismiss the application."

12. At the oral proceedings, the following submissions were presented by the Parties:

On behalf of the Government of the Congo,

"In light of the facts and arguments set out during the written and oral proceedings, the Government of the Democratic Republic of the Congo requests the Court to adjudge and declare that:

1. by issuing and internationally circulating the arrest warrant of 11 April 2000 against Mr. Abdulaye Yerodia Ndombasi, Belgium committed a violation in regard to the Democratic Republic of the Congo of the rule of customary international law concerning the absolute inviolability and immunity from criminal process of incumbent foreign ministers; in so doing, it violated the principle of sovereign equality among States;
2. a formal finding by the Court of the unlawfulness of that act constitutes an appropriate form of satisfaction, providing reparation for the consequent moral injury to the Democratic Republic of the Congo;
3. the violations of international law underlying the issue and international circulation of the arrest warrant of 11 April 2000 preclude any State, including Belgium, from executing it;
4. Belgium shall be required to recall and cancel the arrest warrant of 11 April 2000 and to inform the foreign authorities to whom the warrant was circulated that Belgium renounces its request for their co-operation in executing the unlawful warrant."

On behalf of the Government of Belgium,

"For the reasons stated in the Counter-Memorial of Belgium and in its oral submissions, Belgium requests the Court, as a preliminary matter, to adjudge and declare that the Court lacks jurisdiction in this case and/or that the Application by the Democratic Republic of the Congo against Belgium is inadmissible.

If, contrary to the submissions of Belgium with regard to the Court's jurisdiction and the admissibility of the Application, the Court concludes that it does have jurisdiction in this case and that the Application by the Democratic Republic of the Congo is admissible, Belgium requests the Court to reject the submissions of the Democratic Republic of the Congo on the merits of the case and to dismiss the Application."

* * *

13. On 11 April 2000 an investigating judge of the Brussels Tribunal de première instance issued "an international arrest warrant in absentia" against Mr. Abdulaye Yerodia Ndombasi, charging him, as perpetrator or co-perpetrator, with offences constituting grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions of 1949 and of the Additional Protocols thereto, and with crimes against humanity.

At the time when the arrest warrant was issued Mr. Yerodia was the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Congo.

14. The arrest warrant was transmitted to the Congo on 7 June 2000, being received by the Congolese authorities on 12 July 2000. According to Belgium, the warrant was at the same time transmitted to the International Criminal Police Organization (Interpol), an organization whose function is to enhance and facilitate cross-border criminal police co-operation worldwide; through the latter, it was circulated internationally.

15. In the arrest warrant, Mr. Yerodia is accused of having made various speeches inciting racial hatred during the month of August 1998. The crimes with which Mr. Yerodia was charged were punishable in Belgium under the Law of 16 June 1993 "concerning the Punishment of Grave Breaches of the International Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949 and of Protocols I and II of 8 June 1977 Additional Thereto", as amended by the Law of 10 February 1999 "concerning the Punishment of Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law" (hereinafter referred to as the "Belgian Law").

Article 7 of the Belgian Law provides that "The Belgian courts shall have jurisdiction in respect of the offences provided for in the present Law, wheresoever they may have been committed". In the present case, according to Belgium, the complaints that initiated the proceedings as a result of which the arrest warrant was issued emanated from 12 individuals all resident in Belgium, five of whom were of Belgian nationality. It is not contested by Belgium, however, that the alleged acts to which the arrest warrant relates were committed outside Belgian territory, that Mr. Yerodia was not a Belgian national at the time of those acts, and that Mr. Yerodia was not in Belgian territory at the time that the arrest warrant was issued and circulated. That no Belgian nationals were victims of the violence that was said to have resulted from Mr. Yerodia's alleged offences was also uncontested.

Article 5, paragraph 3, of the Belgian Law further provides that "[i]mmunity attaching to the official capacity of a person shall not prevent the application of the present Law".

16. At the hearings, Belgium further claimed that it offered "to entrust the case to the competent authorities [of the Congo] for enquiry and possible prosecution", and referred to a certain number of steps which it claimed to have taken in this regard from September 2000, that is, before the filing of the Application instituting proceedings. The Congo for its part stated the following: "We have scant information concerning the form [of these Belgian proposals]." It added that "these proposals . . . appear to have been made very belatedly, namely after an arrest warrant against Mr. Yerodia had been issued".

17. On 17 October 2000, the Congo filed in the Registry an Application instituting the present proceedings (see paragraph 1 above), in which the Court was requested "to declare that the Kingdom of Belgium shall annul the international arrest warrant issued on 11 April 2000". The Congo relied in its Application on two separate legal grounds. First, it claimed that "[t]he universal jurisdiction that the Belgian State attributes to itself under Article 7 of the Law in question" constituted a

> "[v]iolation of the principle that a State may not exercise its authority on the territory of another State and of the principle of sovereign equality among all Members of the United Nations, as laid down in Article 2, paragraph 1, of the Charter of the United Nations".

Secondly, it claimed that "[t]he non-recognition, on the basis of Article 5 . . . of the Belgian Law, of the immunity of a Minister for Foreign Affairs in office" constituted a "[v]iolation of the diplomatic immunity of the Minister for Foreign Affairs of a sovereign State, as recognized by the jurisprudence of the Court and following from Article 41, paragraph 2, of the Vienna Convention of 18 April 1961 on Diplomatic Relations".

18. On the same day that it filed its Application instituting proceedings, the Congo submitted a request to the Court for the indication of a provisional measure under Article 41 of the Statute of the Court. During the hearings devoted to consideration of that request, the Court was informed that in November 2000 a ministerial reshuffle had taken place in the Congo, following which Mr. Yerodia had ceased to hold office as Minister for Foreign Affairs and had been entrusted with the portfolio of Minister of Education. Belgium accordingly claimed that the Congo's Application had become moot and asked the Court, as has already been recalled, to remove the case from the List. By Order of 8 December 2000, the Court rejected both Belgium's submissions to that effect and also the Congo's request for the indication of provisional measures (see paragraph 4 above).

19. From mid-April 2001, with the formation of a new Government in the Congo, Mr. Yerodia ceased to hold the post of Minister of Education. He no longer holds any ministerial office today.

20. On 12 September 2001, the Belgian National Central Bureau of Interpol requested the Interpol General Secretariat to issue a Red Notice in respect of Mr. Yerodia. Such notices concern individuals whose arrest is requested with a view to extradition. On 19 October 2001, at the public sittings held to hear the oral arguments of the Parties in the case, Belgium informed the Court that Interpol had responded on 27 September 2001 with a request for additional information, and that no Red Notice had yet been circulated.

21. Although the Application of the Congo originally advanced two separate legal grounds (see paragraph 17 above), the submissions of the Congo in its Memorial and the final submissions which it presented at the end of the oral proceedings refer only to a violation "in regard to the . . . Congo of the rule of customary international law concerning the absolute inviolability and immunity from criminal process of incumbent foreign ministers" (see paragraphs 11 and 12 above).

* * *

22. In their written pleadings, and in oral argument, the Parties addressed issues of jurisdiction and admissibility as well as the merits (see paragraphs 5 and 6 above). In this connection, Belgium raised certain objections which the Court will begin by addressing.

* *

23. The first objection presented by Belgium reads as follows:

> "That, in the light of the fact that Mr. Yerodia Ndombasi is no longer either Minister for Foreign Affairs of the [Congo] or a minister occupying any other position in the . . . Government [of the Congo], there is no longer a 'legal dispute' between the Parties within the meaning of this term in the Optional Clause Declarations of the Parties and that the Court accordingly lacks jurisdiction in this case."

24. Belgium does not deny that such a legal dispute existed between the Parties at the time when the Congo filed its Application instituting proceedings, and that the Court was properly seised by that Application. However, it contends that the question is not whether a legal dispute existed at that time, but whether a legal dispute exists at the present time. Belgium refers in this respect inter alia to the Northern Cameroons case, in which the Court found that it "may pronounce judgment only in connection with concrete cases where there exists at the time of the adjudication an actual controversy involving a conflict of legal interests between the parties" (I.C.J. Reports 1963, pp. 33-34), as well as to the Nuclear Tests cases (Australia v. France) (New Zealand v. France), in which the Court stated the following: "The Court, as a court of law, is called upon to resolve existing disputes between States . . . The dispute brought before it must therefore continue to exist at the time when the Court makes its decision" (I.C.J. Reports 1974, pp. 270-271, para. 55; p. 476, para. 58). Belgium argues that the position of Mr. Yerodia as Minister for Foreign Affairs was central to the Congo's Application instituting proceedings, and emphasizes that there has now been a change of circumstances at the very heart of the case, in view of the fact that Mr. Yerodia was relieved of his position as Minister for Foreign Affairs in November 2000 and that, since 15 April 2001, he has occupied no position in the Government of the Congo (see paragraphs 18 and 19 above). According to Belgium, while there may still be a difference of opinion between the Parties on the scope and content of international law governing the immunities of a Minister for Foreign Affairs, that difference of opinion has now become a matter of abstract, rather than of practical, concern. The result, in Belgium's view, is that the case has become an attempt by the Congo to "[seek] an advisory opinion from the Court", and no longer a "concrete case" involving an "actual controversy" between the Parties, and that the Court accordingly lacks jurisdiction in the case.

25. The Congo rejects this objection of Belgium. It contends that there is indeed a legal dispute between the Parties, in that the Congo claims that the arrest warrant was issued in violation of the immunity of its Minister for Foreign Affairs, that that warrant was unlawful ab initio, and that this legal defect persists despite the subsequent changes in the position occupied by the individual concerned, while Belgium maintains that the issue and circulation of the arrest warrant were not contrary to international law. The Congo adds that the termination of Mr. Yerodia's official duties in no way operated to efface the wrongful act and the injury that flowed from it, for which the Congo continues to seek redress.

26. The Court recalls that, according to its settled jurisprudence, its jurisdiction must be determined at the time that the act instituting proceedings was filed. Thus, if the Court has jurisdiction on the date the case is referred to it, it continues to do so regardless of subsequent events. Such events might lead to a finding that an application has subsequently become moot and to a decision not to proceed to judgment on the merits, but they cannot deprive the Court of jurisdiction (see Nottebohm, Preliminary Objection, Judgment, I.C.J. Reports 1953, p. 122; Right of Passage over Indian Territory, Preliminary Objections, Judgment, I.C.J. Reports 1957, p. 142; Questions of Interpretation and Application of the 1971 Montreal Convention arising from the Aerial Incident at Lockerbie (Libyan Arab Jamahiriya v. United Kingdom), Preliminary Objections, Judgment, I.C.J. Reports 1998, pp. 23-24, para. 38; and Questions of Interpretation and Application of the 1971 Montreal Convention arising from the Aerial Incident at Lockerbie (Libyan Arab Jamahiriya v. United States of America), Preliminary Objections, Judgment, I.C.J. Reports 1998, p. 129, para. 37).

27. Article 36, paragraph 2, of the Statute of the Court provides:

> "The States parties to the present Statute may at any time declare that they recognize as compulsory ipso facto and without special agreement, in relation to any other State accepting the same obligation, the jurisdiction of the Court in all legal disputes concerning:
>
> (a) the interpretation of a treaty;
> (b) any question of international law;
> (c) the existence of any fact which, if established, would constitute a breach of an international obligation;
> (d) the nature or extent of the reparation to be made for the breach of an international obligation."

On 17 October 2000, the date that the Congo's Application instituting these proceedings was filed, each of the Parties was bound by a declaration of acceptance of compulsory jurisdiction, filed in accordance with the above provision: Belgium by a declaration of 17 June 1958 and the Congo by a declaration of 8 February 1989. Those declarations contained no reservation applicable to the present case.

Moreover, it is not contested by the Parties that at the material time there was a legal dispute between them concerning the international lawfulness of the arrest warrant of 11 April 2000 and the consequences to be drawn if the warrant was unlawful. Such a dispute was clearly a legal dispute within the meaning of the Court's jurisprudence, namely "a disagreement on a point of law or fact, a conflict of legal views or of interests between two persons" in which "the claim of one party is positively opposed by the other" (Questions of Interpretation and Application of the 1971 Montreal Convention arising from the Aerial Incident at Lockerbie (Libyan Arab Jamahiriya v. United Kingdom), Preliminary Objections, Judgment, I.C.J. Reports 1998, p. 17, para. 22; and Questions of Interpretation and Application of the 1971 Montreal Convention arising from the Aerial Incident at Lockerbie (Libyan Arab Jamahiriya v. United States of America), Preliminary Objections, Juagment, I.C.J. Reports 1998, pp. 122-123, para. 21).

28. The Court accordingly concludes that at the time that it was seised of the case it had jurisdiction to deal with it, and that it still has such jurisdiction. Belgium's first objection must therefore be rejected.

* *

29. The second objection presented by Belgium is the following:

> "That in the light of the fact that Mr. Yerodia Ndombasi is no longer either Minister for Foreign Affairs of the [Congo] or a minister occupying any other position in the . . Government [of the Congo], the case is now without object and the Court should accordingly decline to proceed to judgment on the merits of the case."

30. Belgium also relies in support of this objection on the Northern Cameroons case, in which the Court considered that it would not be a proper discharge of its duties to proceed further in a case in which any judgment that the Court might pronounce would be "without object" (I.C.J. Reports 1963, p. 38), and on the Nuclear Tests cases, in which the Court saw "no reason to allow the continuance of proceedings which it knows are bound to be fruitless" (I.C.J. Reports 1974, p. 271, para. 58; p. 477, para. 61). Belgium maintains that the declarations requested by the Congo in its first and second submissions would clearly fall within the principles enunciated by the Court in those cases, since a judgment of the Court on the merits in this case could only be directed towards the clarification of the law in this area for the future, or be designed to reinforce the position of one or other Party. It relies in support of this argument on the fact that the Congo does not allege any material injury and is not seeking compensatory damages. It adds that the issue and transmission of the arrest warrant were not predicated on the ministerial status of the person concerned, that he is no longer a minister, and that the case is accordingly now devoid of object.

31. The Congo contests this argument of Belgium, and emphasizes that the aim of the Congo — to have the disputed arrest warrant annulled and to obtain redress for the moral injury suffered — remains unachieved at the point in time when the Court is called upon to decide the dispute. According to the Congo, in order for the case to have become devoid of object during the proceedings, the cause of the violation of the right would have had to disappear, and the redress sought would have to have been obtained.

32. The Court has already affirmed on a number of occasions that events occurring subsequent to the filing of an application may render the application without object such that the Court is not called upon to give a decision thereon (see Questions of Interpretation and Application of the 1971 Mont- real Convention arising from the Aerial Incident at Lockerbie (Libyan Arab Jamahiriya v. United Kingdom), Preliminary Objections, Judgment, I.C.J. Reports 1998, p. 26, para. 46; and Questions of Interpretation and Application of the 1971 Montreal Convention arising from the Aerial Incident at Lockerbie (Libyan Arab Jamahiriya v. United States of America), Preliminary Objections, Judgment, I.C.J. Reports 1998, p. 131, para. 45).

However, it considers that this is not such a case. The change which has occurred in the situation of Mr. Yerodia has not in fact put an end to the dispute between the Parties and has not deprived the Application of its object. The Congo argues that the arrest warrant issued by the Belgian judicial authorities against Mr. Yerodia was and remains unlawful. It asks the Court to hold that the warrant is unlawful, thus providing redress for the moral injury which the warrant allegedly caused to it. The Congo also continues to seek the cancellation of the warrant. For its part, Belgium contends that it did not act in violation of international law and it disputes the Congo's submissions. In the view of the Court, it follows from the foregoing that the Application of the Congo is not now without object and that accordingly the case is not moot. Belgium's second objection must accordingly be rejected.

* *

33. The third Belgian objection is put as follows:

> "That the case as it now stands is materially different to that set out in the [Congo]'s Application instituting proceedings and that the Court accordingly lacks jurisdiction in the case and/or that the application is inadmissible."

34. According to Belgium, it would be contrary to legal security and the sound administration of justice for an applicant State to continue proceedings in circumstances in which the factual dimension on which the Application was based has changed fundamentally, since the respondent State would in those circumstances be uncertain, until the very last moment, of the substance of the claims against it. Belgium argues that the prejudice suffered by the respondent State in this situation is analogous to the situation in which an applicant State formulates new claims during the course of the proceedings. It refers to the jurisprudence of the Court holding inadmissible new claims formulated during the course of the proceedings which, had they been entertained, would have transformed the subject of the dispute originally brought before it under the terms of the Application (see Fisheries Jurisdiction (Spain v. Canada), Jurisdiction of the Court, Judgment, I.C.J. Reports 1998, pp. 447-448, para. 29). In the circumstances, Belgium contends that, if the Congo wishes to maintain its claims, it should be required to initiate proceedings afresh or, at the very least, apply to the Court for permission to amend its initial Application.

35. In response, the Congo denies that there has been a substantial amendment of the terms of its Application, and insists that it has presented no new claim, whether of substance or of form, that would have transformed the subject-matter of the dispute. The Congo maintains that it has done nothing through the various stages in the proceedings but "condense and refine" its claims, as do most States that appear before the Court, and that it is simply making use of the right of parties to amend their submissions until the end of the oral proceedings.

36. The Court notes that, in accordance with settled jurisprudence, it "cannot, in principle, allow a dispute brought before it by application to be transformed by amendments in the submissions into another dispute which is different in character" (Société commerciale de Belgique, Judgment, 1939, P.C.I.J., Series A/B, No. 78, p. 173; cf. Military and Paramilitary Activities in and against Nicaragua (Nicaragua v. United States of America), Jurisdiction and Admissibility, Judgment, I.C.J. Reports 1984, p. 427, para. 80; see also Certain Phosphate Lands in Nauru (Nauru v. Australia), Preliminary Objections, Judgment, I.C.J. Reports 1992, pp. 264-267, in particular paras. 69 and 70). However, the Court considers that in the present case the facts underlying the Application have not changed in a way that produced such a transformation in the dispute brought before it. The question submitted to the Court for decision remains whether the issue and circulation of the arrest warrant by the Belgian judicial authorities against a person who was at that time the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Congo were contrary to international law. The Congo's final submissions arise "directly out of the question which is the subject-matter of that Application" (Fisheries Jurisdiction (Federal Republic of Germany v. Iceland), Merits, Judgment, I.C.J. Reports 1974, p. 203, para. 72; see also Temple of Preah Vihear, Merits, Judgment, I.C.J. Reports 1962, p. 36).

In these circumstances, the Court considers that Belgium cannot validly maintain that the dispute brought before the Court was transformed in a way that affected its ability to prepare its defence, or that the requirements of the sound administration of justice were infringed. Belgium's third objection must accordingly be rejected.

* *

37. The fourth Belgian objection reads as follows:

> "That, in the light of the new circumstances concerning Mr. Yerodia Ndombasi, the case has assumed the character of an action of diplomatic protection but one in which the individual being protected has failed to exhaust local remedies, and that the Court accordingly lacks jurisdiction in the case and/or that the application is inadmissible."

38. In this respect, Belgium accepts that, when the case was first instituted, the Congo had a direct legal interest in the matter, and was asserting a claim in its own name in respect of the alleged violation by Belgium of the immunity of the Congo's Foreign Minister. However, according to Belgium, the case was radically transformed after the Application was filed, namely on 15 April 2001, when Mr. Yerodia ceased to be a member of the Congolese Government. Belgium maintains that two of the requests made of the Court in the Congo's final submissions in practice now concern the legal effect of an arrest warrant issued against a private citizen of the Congo, and that these issues fall within the realm of an action of diplomatic protection. It adds that the individual concerned has not exhausted all available remedies under Belgian law a necessary condition before the Congo can espouse the cause of one of its nationals in international proceedings.

39. The Congo, on the other hand, denies that this is an action for diplomatic protection. It maintains that it is bringing these proceedings in the name of the Congolese State, on account of the violation of the immunity of its Minister for Foreign Affairs. The Congo further denies the availability of remedies under Belgian law. It points out in this regard that it is only when the Crown Prosecutor has become seised of the case file and makes submissions to the Chambre du conseil that the accused can defend himself before the Chambre and seek to have the charge dismissed.

40. The Court notes that the Congo has never sought to invoke before it Mr. Yerodia's personal rights. It considers that, despite the change in professional situation of Mr. Yerodia, the character of the dispute submitted to the Court by means of the Application has not changed: the dispute still concerns the lawfulness of the arrest warrant issued on 11 April 2000 against a person who was at the time Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Congo, and the question whether the rights of the Congo have or have not been violated by that warrant. As the Congo is not acting in the context of protection of one of its nationals, Belgium cannot rely upon the rules relating to the exhaustion of local remedies.

In any event, the Court recalls that an objection based on non-exhaustion of local remedies relates to the admissibility of the application (see Interhandel, Preliminary Objections, Judgment, I.C.J. Reports 1959, p. 26; Elettronica Sicula S.p.A. (ELSI), Judgment, I.C.J. Reports 1989, p. 42, para. 49). Under settled jurisprudence, the critical date for determining the admissibility of an application is the date on which it is filed (see Questions of Interpretation and Application of the 1971 Montreal Convention arising from the Aerial Incident at Lockerbie (Libyan Arab Jamahiriya v. United Kingdom), Preliminary Objections, Judgment, I.C.J. Reports 1998, pp. 25-26, paras. 43-44; and Questions of Interpretation and Application of the 1971 Montreal Convention arising from the Aerial Incident at Lockerbie (Libyan Arab Jamahiriya v. United States of America), Preliminary Objections, Judgment, I.C.J. Reports 1998, pp. 130-131, paras. 42-43). Belgium accepts that, on the date on which the Congo filed the Application instituting proceedings, the Congo had a direct legal interest in the matter, and was asserting a claim in its own name. Belgium's fourth objection must accordingly be rejected.

41. As a subsidiary argument, Belgium further contends that "[i]n the event that the Court decides that it does have jurisdiction in this case and that the application is admissible, . . . the non ultra petita rule operates to limit the jurisdiction of the Court to those issues that are the subject of the [Congo]'s final submissions". Belgium points out that, while the Congo initially advanced a twofold argument, based, on the one hand, on the Belgian judge's lack of jurisdiction, and, on the other, on the immunity from jurisdiction enjoyed by its Minister for Foreign Affairs, the Congo no longer claims in its final submissions that Belgium wrongly conferred upon itself universal jurisdiction in absentia. According to Belgium, the Congo now confines itself to arguing that the arrest warrant of 11 April 2000 was unlawful because it violated the immunity from jurisdiction of its Minister for Foreign Affairs, and that the Court consequently cannot rule on the issue of universal jurisdiction in any decision it renders on the merits of the case.

42. The Congo, for its part, states that its interest in bringing these proceedings is to obtain a finding by the Court that it has been the victim of an internationally wrongful act, the question whether this case involves the "exercise of an excessive universal jurisdiction" being in this connection only a secondary consideration. The Congo asserts that any consideration by the Court of the issues of international law raised by universal jurisdiction would be undertaken not at the request of the Congo but, rather, by virtue of the defence strategy adopted by Belgium, which appears to maintain that the exercise of such jurisdiction can "represent a valid counterweight to the observance of immunities".

43. The Court would recall the well-established principle that "it is the duty of the Court not only to reply to the questions as stated in the final submissions of the parties, but also to abstain from deciding points not included in those submissions" (Asylum, Judgment, I.C.J. Reports 1950, p. 402). While the Court is thus not entitled to decide upon questions not asked of it, the non ultra petita rule nonetheless cannot preclude the Court from addressing certain legal points in its reasoning. Thus in the present case the Court may not rule, in the operative part of its Judgment, on the question whether the disputed arrest warrant, issued by the Belgian investigating judge in exercise of his purported universal jurisdiction, complied in that regard with the rules and principles of international law governing the jurisdiction of national courts. This does not mean, however, that the Court may not deal with certain aspects of that question in the reasoning of its Judgment, should it deem this necessary or desirable.

44. The Court concludes from the foregoing that it has jurisdiction to entertain the Congo's Application, that the Application is not without object and that accordingly the case is not moot and that the Application is admissible. Thus, the Court now turns to the merits of the case.

* * *

45. As indicated above (see paragraphs 41 to 43 above), in its Application instituting these proceedings, the Congo originally challenged the legality of the arrest warrant of 11 April 2000 on two separate grounds: on the one hand, Belgium's claim to exercise a universal jurisdiction and, on the other, the alleged violation of the immunities of the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Congo then in office. However, in its submissions in its Memorial, and in its final submissions at the close of the oral proceedings, the Congo invokes only the latter ground.

46. As a matter of logic, the second ground should be addressed only once there has been a determination in respect of the first, since it is only where a State has jurisdiction under international law in relation to a particular matter that there can be any question of immunities in regard to the exercise of that jurisdiction. However, in the present case, and in view of the final form of the Congo's submissions, the Court will address first the question whether, assuming that it had jurisdiction under international law to issue and circulate the arrest warrant of 11 April 2000, Belgium in so doing violated the immunities of the then Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Congo.

and to immunity from criminal process being "absolute or complete", that is to say, they are subject to no exception. Accordingly, the Congo contends that no criminal prosecution may be brought against a Minister for Foreign Affairs in a foreign court as long as he or she remains in office, and that any finding of criminal responsibility by a domestic court in a foreign country, or any act of investigation undertaken with a view to bringing him or her to court, would contravene the principle of immunity from jurisdiction. According to the Congo, the basis of such criminal immunity is purely functional, and immunity is accorded under customary international law simply in order to enable the foreign State representative enjoying such immunity to perform his or her functions freely and without let or hindrance. The Congo adds that the immunity thus accorded to Ministers for Foreign Affairs when in office covers all their acts, including any committed before they took office, and that it is irrelevant whether the acts done whilst in office may be characterized or not as "official acts".

48. The Congo states further that it does not deny the existence of a principle of international criminal law, deriving from the decisions of the Nuremberg and Tokyo international military tribunals, that the accused's official capacity at the time of the acts cannot, before any court, whether domestic or international, constitute a "ground of exemption from his criminal responsibility or a ground for mitigation of sentence". The Congo then stresses that the fact that an immunity might bar prosecution before a specific court or over a specific period does not mean that the same prosecution cannot be brought, if appropriate, before another court which is not bound by that immunity, or at another time when the immunity need no longer be taken into account. It concludes that immunity does not mean impunity.

49. Belgium maintains for its part that, while Ministers for Foreign Affairs in office generally enjoy an immunity from jurisdiction before the courts of a foreign State, such immunity applies only to acts carried out in the course of their official functions, and cannot protect such persons in respect of private acts or when they are acting otherwise than in the performance of their official functions.

50. Belgium further states that, in the circumstances of the present case, Mr. Yerodia enjoyed no immunity at the time when he is alleged to have committed the acts of which he is accused, and that there is no evidence that he was then acting in any official capacity. It observes that the arrest warrant was issued against Mr. Yerodia personally.

holders of high-ranking office in a State, such as the Head of State, Head of Government and Minister for Foreign Affairs, enjoy immunities from jurisdiction in other States, both civil and criminal. For the purposes of the present case, it is only the immunity from criminal jurisdiction and the inviolability of an incumbent Minister for Foreign Affairs that fall for the Court to consider.

52. A certain number of treaty instruments were cited by the Parties in this regard. These included, first, the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations of 18 April 1961, which states in its preamble that the purpose of diplomatic privileges and immunities is "to ensure the efficient performance of the functions of diplomatic missions as representing States". It provides in Article 32 that only the sending State may waive such immunity. On these points, the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations, to which both the Congo and Belgium are parties, reflects customary international law. The same applies to the corresponding provisions of the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations of 24 April 1963, to which the Congo and Belgium are also parties.

The Congo and Belgium further cite the New York Convention on Special Missions of 8 December 1969, to which they are not, however, parties. They recall that under Article 21, paragraph 2, of that Convention:

> "The Head of the Government, the Minister for Foreign Affairs and other persons of high rank, when they take part in a special mission of the sending State, shall enjoy in the receiving State or in a third State, in addition to what is granted by the present Convention, the facilities, privileges and immunities accorded by international law."

These conventions provide useful guidance on certain aspects of the question of immunities. They do not, however, contain any provision specifically defining the immunities enjoyed by Ministers for Foreign Affairs. It is consequently on the basis of customary international law that the Court must decide the questions relating to the immunities of such Ministers raised in the present case.

53. In customary international law, the immunities accorded to Ministers for Foreign Affairs are not granted for their personal benefit, but to ensure the effective performance of their functions on behalf of their respective States. In order to determine the extent of these immunities, the Court must therefore first consider the nature of the functions exercised by a Minister for Foreign Affairs. He or she is in charge of his or her Government's diplomatic activities and generally acts as its representative in international negotiations and intergovernmental meetings. Ambassadors and other diplomatic agents carry out their duties under his or her authority. His or her acts may bind the State represented, and there is a presumption that a Minister for Foreign Affairs, simply by virtue of that office, has full powers to act on behalf of the State (see, for example, Article 7, paragraph 2 (a), of the 1969 Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties). In the performance of these functions, he or she is frequently required to travel internationally, and thus must be in a position freely to do so whenever the need should arise. He or she must also be in constant communication with the Government, and with its diplomatic missions around the world, and be capable at any time of communicating with representatives of other States. The Court further observes that a Minister for Foreign Affairs, responsible for the conduct of his or her State's relations with all other States, occupies a position such that, like the Head of State or the Head of Government, he or she is recognized under international law as representative of the State solely by virtue of his or her office. He or she does not have to present letters of credence: to the contrary, it is generally the Minister who determines the authority to be conferred upon diplomatic agents and countersigns their letters of credence. Finally, it is to the Minister for Foreign Affairs that chargés d'affaires are accredited.

54. The Court accordingly concludes that the functions of a Minister for Foreign Affairs are such that, throughout the duration of his or her office, he or she when abroad enjoys full immunity from criminal jurisdiction and inviolability. That immunity and that inviolability protect the individual concerned against any act of authority of another State which would hinder him or her in the performance of his or her duties.

55. In this respect, no distinction can be drawn between acts performed by a Minister for Foreign Affairs in an "official" capacity, and those claimed to have been performed in a "private capacity", or, for that matter, between acts performed before the person concerned assumed office as Minister for Foreign Affairs and acts committed during the period of office. Thus, if a Minister for Foreign Affairs is arrested in another State on a criminal charge, he or she is clearly thereby prevented from exercising the functions of his or her office. The consequences of such impediment to the exercise of those official functions are equally serious, regardless of whether the Minister for Foreign Affairs was, at the time of arrest, present in the territory of the arresting State on an "official" visit or a "private" visit, regardless of whether the arrest relates to acts allegedly performed before the person became the Minister for Foreign Affairs or to acts performed while in office, and regardless of whether the arrest relates to alleged acts performed in an "official" capacity or a "private" capacity. Furthermore, even the mere risk that, by travelling to or transiting another State a Minister for Foreign Affairs might be exposing himself or herself to legal proceedings could deter the Minister from travelling internationally when required to do so for the purposes of the performance of his or her official functions.

56. The Court will now address Belgium's argument that immunities accorded to incumbent Ministers for Foreign Affairs can in no case protect them where they are suspected of having committed war crimes or crimes against humanity. In support of this position, Belgium refers in its Counter-Memorial to various legal instruments creating international criminal tribunals, to examples from national legislation, and to the jurisprudence of national and international courts.

Belgium begins by pointing out that certain provisions of the instruments creating international criminal tribunals state expressly that the official capacity of a person shall not be a bar to the exercise by such tribunals of their jurisdiction.

Belgium also places emphasis on certain decisions of national courts, and in particular on the judgments rendered on 24 March 1999 by the House of Lords in the United Kingdom and on 13 March 2001 by the Court of Cassation in France in the Pinochet and Qaddafi cases respectively, in which it contends that an exception to the immunity rule was accepted in the case of serious crimes under international law. Thus, according to Belgium, the Pinochet decision recognizes an exception to the immunity rule when Lord Millett stated that "[i]nternational law cannot be supposed to have established a crime having the character of a jus cogens and at the same time to have provided an immunity which is coextensive with the obligation it seeks to impose", or when Lord Phillips of Worth Matravers said that "no established rule of international law requires state immunity ratione materiae to be accorded in respect of prosecution for an international crime". As to the French Court of Cassation, Belgium contends that, in holding that, "under international law as it currently stands, the crime alleged [acts of terrorism], irrespective of its gravity, does not come within the exceptions to the principle of immunity from jurisdiction for incumbent foreign Heads of State", the Court explicitly recognized the existence of such exceptions.

57. The Congo, for its part, states that, under international law as it currently stands, there is no basis for asserting that there is any exception to the principle of absolute immunity from criminal process of an incumbent Minister for Foreign Affairs where he or she is accused of having committed crimes under international law.

In support of this contention, the Congo refers to State practice, giving particular consideration in this regard to the Pinochet and Qaddafi cases, and concluding that such practice does not correspond to that which Belgium claims but, on the contrary, confirms the absolute nature of the immunity from criminal process of Heads of State and Ministers for Foreign Affairs. Thus, in the Pinochet case, the Congo cites Lord Browne-Wilkinson's statement that "[t]his immunity enjoyed by a head of state in power and an ambassador in post is a complete immunity attached to the person of the head of state or ambassador and rendering him immune from all actions or prosecutions . . .". According to the Congo, the French Court of Cassation adopted the same position in its Qaddafi judgment, in affirming that "international custom bars the prosecution of incumbent Heads of State, in the absence of any contrary international provision binding on the parties concerned, before the criminal courts of a foreign State".

As regards the instruments creating international criminal tribunals and the latter's jurisprudence, these, in the Congo's view, concern only those tribunals, and no inference can be drawn from them in regard to criminal proceedings before national courts against persons enjoying immunity under international law.

58. The Court has carefully examined State practice, including national legislation and those few decisions of national higher courts, such as the House of Lords or the French Court of Cassation. It has been unable to deduce from this practice that there exists under customary international law any form of exception to the rule according immunity from criminal jurisdiction and inviolability to incumbent Ministers for Foreign Affairs, where they are suspected of having committed war crimes or crimes against humanity.

The Court has also examined the rules concerning the immunity or criminal responsibility of persons having an official capacity contained in the legal instruments creating international criminal tribunals, and which are specifically applicable to the latter (see Charter of the International Military Tribunal of Nuremberg, Art. 7; Charter of the International Military Tribunal of Tokyo, Art. 6; Statute of the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia, Art. 7, para. 2; Statute of the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda, Art. 6, para. 2; Statute of the International Criminal Court, Art. 27). It finds that these rules likewise do not enable it to conclude that any such an exception exists in customary international law in regard to national courts.

Finally, none of the decisions of the Nuremberg and Tokyo international military tribunals, or of the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia, cited by Belgium deal with the question of the immunities of incumbent Ministers for Foreign Affairs before national courts where they are accused of having committed war crimes or crimes against humanity. The Court accordingly notes that those decisions are in no way at variance with the findings it has reached above.

In view of the foregoing, the Court accordingly cannot accept Belgium's argument in this regard.

59. It should further be noted that the rules governing the jurisdiction of national courts must be carefully distinguished from those governing jurisdictional immunities: jurisdiction does not imply absence of immunity, while absence of immunity does not imply jurisdiction. Thus,

although various international conventions on the prevention and punishment of certain serious crimes impose on States obligations of prosecution or extradition, thereby requiring them to extend their criminal jurisdiction, such extension of jurisdiction in no way affects immunities under customary international law, including those of Ministers for Foreign Affairs. These remain opposable before the courts of a foreign State, even where those courts exercise such a jurisdiction under these conventions.

60. The Court emphasizes, however, that the immunity from jurisdiction enjoyed by incumbent Ministers for Foreign Affairs does not mean that they enjoy impunity in respect of any crimes they might have committed, irrespective of their gravity. Immunity from criminal jurisdiction and individual criminal responsibility are quite separate concepts. While jurisdictional immunity is procedural in nature, criminal responsibility is a question of substantive law. Jurisdictional immunity may well bar prosecution for a certain period or for certain offences; it cannot exonerate the person to whom it applies from all criminal responsibility.

61. Accordingly, the immunities enjoyed under international law by an incumbent or former Minister for Foreign Affairs do not represent a bar to criminal prosecution in certain circumstances.

First, such persons enjoy no criminal immunity under international law in their own countries, and may thus be tried by those countries' courts in accordance with the relevant rules of domestic law.

Secondly, they will cease to enjoy immunity from foreign jurisdiction if the State which they represent or have represented decides to waive that immunity.

Thirdly, after a person ceases to hold the office of Minister for Foreign Affairs, he or she will no longer enjoy all of the immunities accorded by international law in other States. Provided that it has jurisdiction under international law, a court of one State may try a former Minister for Foreign Affairs of another State in respect of acts committed prior or subsequent to his or her period of office, as well as in respect of acts committed during that period of office in a private capacity.

Fourthly, an incumbent or former Minister for Foreign Affairs may be subject to criminal proceedings before certain international criminal courts, where they have jurisdiction. Examples include the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia, and the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda, established pursuant to Security Council resolutions under Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter, and the future International Criminal Court created by the 1998 Rome Convention. The latter's Statute expressly provides, in Article 27, paragraph 2, that "[i]mmunities or special procedural rules which may attach to the official capacity of a person, whether under national or international law, shall not bar the Court from exercising its jurisdiction over such a person".

62. Given the conclusions it has reached above concerning the nature and scope of the rules governing the immunity from criminal jurisdiction enjoyed by incumbent Ministers for Foreign Affairs, the Court must now consider whether in the present case the issue of the arrest warrant of 11 April 2000 and its international circulation violated those rules. The Court recalls in this regard that the Congo requests it, in its first final submission, to adjudge and declare that:

> "[B]y issuing and internationally circulating the arrest warrant of 11 April 2000 against Mr. Abdulaye Yerodia Ndombasi, Belgium committed a violation in regard to the Democratic Republic of the Congo of the rule of customary international law concerning the absolute inviolability and immunity from criminal process of incumbent foreign ministers; in so doing, it violated the principle of sovereign equality among States."

63. In support of this submission, the Congo maintains that the arrest warrant of 11 April 2000 as such represents a "coercive legal act" which violates the Congo's immunity and sovereign rights, inasmuch as it seeks to "subject to an organ of domestic criminal jurisdiction a member of a foreign government who is in principle beyond its reach" and is fully enforceable without special formality in Belgium.

The Congo considers that the mere issuance of the warrant thus constituted a coercive measure taken against the person of Mr. Yerodia, even if it was not executed.

64. As regards the international circulation of the said arrest warrant, this, in the Congo's view, not only involved further violations of the rules referred to above, but also aggravated the moral injury which it suffered as a result of the opprobrium "thus cast upon one of the most prominent members of its Government". The Congo further argues that such circulation was a fundamental infringement of its sovereign rights in that it significantly restricted the full and free exercise, by its Minister for Foreign Affairs, of the international negotiation and representation functions entrusted to him by the Congo's former President. In the Congo's view, Belgium "[thus] manifests an intention to have the individual concerned arrested at the place where he is to be found, with a view to procuring his extradition". The Congo emphasizes moreover that it is necessary to avoid any confusion between the arguments concerning the legal effect of the arrest warrant abroad and the question of any responsibility of the foreign authorities giving effect to it. It points out in this regard that no State has acted on the arrest warrant, and that accordingly

"no further consideration need be given to the specific responsibility which a State executing it might incur, or to the way in which that responsibility should be related" to that of the Belgian State. The Congo observes that, in such circumstances, "there [would be] a direct causal relationship between the arrest warrant issued in Belgium and any act of enforcement carried out elsewhere".

65. Belgium rejects the Congo's argument on the ground that "the character of the arrest warrant of 11 April 2000 is such that it has neither infringed the sovereignty of, nor created any obligation for, the [Congo]".

With regard to the legal effects under Belgian law of the arrest warrant of 11 April 2000, Belgium contends that the clear purpose of the warrant was to procure that, if found in Belgium, Mr. Yerodia would be detained by the relevant Belgian authorities with a view to his prosecution for war crimes and crimes against humanity. According to Belgium, the Belgian investigating judge did, however, draw an explicit distinction in the warrant between, on the one hand, immunity from jurisdiction and, on the other hand, immunity from enforcement as regards representatives of foreign States who visit Belgium on the basis of an official invitation, making it clear that such persons would be immune from enforcement of an arrest warrant in Belgium. Belgium further contends that, in its effect, the disputed arrest warrant is national in character, since it requires the arrest of Mr. Yerodia if he is found in Belgium but it does not have this effect outside Belgium.

66. In respect of the legal effects of the arrest warrant outside Belgium, Belgium maintains that the warrant does not create any obligation for the authorities of any other State to arrest Mr. Yerodia in the absence of some further step by Belgium completing or validating the arrest warrant (such as a request for the provisional detention of Mr. Yerodia), or the issuing of an arrest warrant by the appropriate authorities in the State concerned following a request to do so, or the issuing of an Interpol Red Notice. Accordingly, outside Belgium, while the purpose of the warrant was admittedly "to establish a legal basis for the arrest of Mr. Yerodia . . . and his subsequent extradition to Belgium", the warrant had no legal effect unless it was validated or completed by some prior act "requiring the arrest of Mr. Yerodia by the relevant authorities in a third State". Belgium further argues that "[i]f a State had executed the arrest warrant, it might infringe Mr. [Yerodia's] criminal immunity", but that "the Party directly responsible for that infringement would have been that State and not Belgium".

67. The Court will first recall that the "international arrest warrant in absentia", issued on 11 April 2000 by an investigating judge of the Brussels Tribunal de première instance, is directed against Mr. Yerodia, stating that he is "currently Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, having his business address at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs in Kinshasa". The warrant states that Mr. Yerodia is charged with being "the perpetrator or co-perpetrator" of:

"— Crimes under international law constituting grave breaches causing harm by act or omission to persons and property protected by the Conventions signed at Geneva on 12 August 1949 and by Additional Protocols I and II to those Conventions (Article 1, paragraph 3, of the Law of 16 June 1993, as amended by the Law of 10 February 1999 concerning the punishment of serious violations of international humanitarian law)
— Crimes against humanity (Article 1, paragraph 2, of the Law of 16 June 1993, as amended by the Law of 10 February 1999 concerning the punishment of serious violations of international humanitarian law)."

The warrant refers to "various speeches inciting racial hatred" and to "particularly virulent remarks" allegedly made by Mr. Yerodia during "public addresses reported by the media" on 4 August and 27 August 1998. It adds:

> "These speeches allegedly had the effect of inciting the population to attack Tutsi residents of Kinshasa: there were dragnet searches, manhunts (the Tutsi enemy) and lynchings.
> The speeches inciting racial hatred thus are said to have resulted in several hundred deaths, the internment of Tutsis, summary executions, arbitrary arrests and unfair trials."

68. The warrant further states that "the position of Minister for Foreign Affairs currently held by the accused does not entail immunity from jurisdiction and enforcement". The investigating judge does, however, observe in the warrant that "the rule concerning the absence of immunity under humanitarian law would appear . . . to require some qualification in respect of immunity from enforcement" and explains as follows:

> "Pursuant to the general principle of fairness in judicial proceedings, immunity from enforcement must, in our view, be accorded to all State representatives welcomed as such onto the territory of Belgium (on 'official visits'). Welcoming such foreign dignitaries as official representatives of sovereign States involves not only relations between individuals but also relations between States. This implies that such welcome includes an undertaking by the host State and its various components to refrain from taking any coercive measures against its guest and the invitation cannot become a pretext for ensnaring the individual concerned in what would then have to be labelled a trap. In the contrary case, failure to respect this

69. The arrest warrant concludes with the following order:

"We instruct and order all bailiffs and agents of public authority who may be so required to execute this arrest warrant and to conduct the accused to the detention centre in Forest;

We order the warden of the prison to receive the accused and to keep him (her) in custody in the detention centre pursuant to this arrest warrant;

We require all those exercising public authority to whom this warrant shall be shown to lend all assistance in executing it."

70. The Court notes that the issuance, as such, of the disputed arrest warrant represents an act by the Belgian judicial authorities intended to enable the arrest on Belgian territory of an incumbent Minister for Foreign Affairs on charges of war crimes and crimes against humanity. The fact that the warrant is enforceable is clearly apparent from the order given to "all bailiffs and agents of public authority . . . to execute this arrest warrant" (see paragraph 69 above) and from the assertion in the warrant that "the position of Minister for Foreign Affairs currently held by the accused does not entail immunity from jurisdiction and enforcement". The Court notes that the warrant did admittedly make an exception for the case of an official visit by Mr. Yerodia to Belgium, and that Mr. Yerodia never suffered arrest in Belgium. The Court is bound, however, to find that, given the nature and purpose of the warrant, its mere issue violated the immunity which Mr. Yerodia enjoyed as the Congo's incumbent Minister for Foreign Affairs. The Court accordingly concludes that the issue of the warrant constituted a violation of an obligation of Belgium towards the Congo, in that it failed to respect the immunity of that Minister and, more particularly, infringed the immunity from criminal jurisdiction and the inviolability then enjoyed by him under international law.

71. The Court also notes that Belgium admits that the purpose of the international circulation of the disputed arrest warrant was "to establish a legal basis for the arrest of Mr. Yerodia . . . abroad and his subsequent extradition to Belgium". The Respondent maintains, however, that the enforcement of the warrant in third States was "dependent on some further preliminary steps having been taken" and that, given the "inchoate" quality of the warrant as regards third States, there was no "infringe[ment of] the sovereignty of the [Congo]". It further points out that no Interpol Red Notice was requested until 12 September 2001, when Mr. Yerodia no longer held ministerial office.

The Court cannot subscribe to this view. As in the case of the warrant's issue, its international circulation from June 2000 by the Belgian authorities, given its nature and purpose, effectively infringed Mr. Yero-dia's immunity as the Congo's incumbent Minister for Foreign Affairs and was furthermore liable to affect the Congo's conduct of its international relations. Since Mr. Yerodia was called upon in that capacity to undertake travel in the performance of his duties, the mere international circulation of the warrant, even in the absence of "further steps" by Belgium, could have resulted, in particular, in his arrest while abroad. The Court observes in this respect that Belgium itself cites information to the effect that Mr. Yerodia, "on applying for a visa to go to two countries, [apparently] learned that he ran the risk of being arrested as a result of the arrest warrant issued against him by Belgium", adding that "[t]his, moreover, is what the [Congo] . . . hints when it writes that the arrest warrant 'sometimes forced Minister Yerodia to travel by roundabout routes'". Accordingly, the Court concludes that the circulation of the warrant, whether or not it significantly interfered with Mr. Yerodia's diplomatic activity, constituted a violation of an obligation of Belgium towards the Congo, in that it failed to respect the immunity of the incumbent Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Congo and, more particularly, infringed the immunity from criminal jurisdiction and the inviolability then enjoyed by him under international law.

* * *

72. The Court will now address the issue of the remedies sought by the Congo on account of Belgium's violation of the above-mentioned rules of international law. In its second, third and fourth submissions, the Congo requests the Court to adjudge and declare that:

> "A formal finding by the Court of the unlawfulness of [the issue and international circulation of the arrest warrant] constitutes an appropriate form of satisfaction, providing reparation for the consequent moral injury to the Democratic Republic of the Congo;
>
> The violations of international law underlying the issue and international circulation of the arrest warrant of 11 April 2000 preclude any State, including Belgium, from executing it;
> Belgium shall be required to recall and cancel the arrest warrant of 11 April 2000 and to inform the foreign authorities to whom the warrant was circulated that Belgium renounces its request for their co-operation in executing the unlawful warrant."

73. In support of those submissions, the Congo asserts that the termination of the official duties of Mr. Yerodia in no way operated to efface the wrongful act and the injury flowing from it, which continue to exist. It argues that the warrant is unlawful ab initio, that "[i]t is fundamentally flawed" and that it cannot therefore have any legal effect today. It points out that the purpose of its request is reparation for the injury caused, requiring the restoration of the situation which would in all probability have existed if the said act had not been committed. It states that, inasmuch as the wrongful act consisted in an internal legal instrument, only the "withdrawal" and "cancellation" of the latter can provide appropriate reparation.

The Congo further emphasizes that in no way is it asking the Court itself to withdraw or cancel the warrant, nor to determine the means whereby Belgium is to comply with its decision. It explains that the withdrawal and cancellation of the warrant, by the means that Belgium deems most suitable, "are not means of enforcement of the judgment of the Court but the requested measure of legal reparation/restitution itself". The Congo maintains that the Court is consequently only being requested to declare that Belgium, by way of reparation for the injury to the rights of the Congo, be required to withdraw and cancel this warrant by the means of its choice.

74. Belgium for its part maintains that a finding by the Court that the immunity enjoyed by Mr. Yerodia as Minister for Foreign Affairs had been violated would in no way entail an obligation to cancel the arrest warrant. It points out that the arrest warrant is still operative and that "there is no suggestion that it presently infringes the immunity of the Congo's Minister for Foreign Affairs". Belgium considers that what the Congo is in reality asking of the Court in its third and fourth final submissions is that the Court should direct Belgium as to the method by which it should give effect to a judgment of the Court finding that the warrant had infringed the immunity of the Congo's Minister for Foreign Affairs.

75. The Court has already concluded (see paragraphs 70 and 71) that the issue and circulation of the arrest warrant of 11 April 2000 by the Belgian authorities failed to respect the immunity of the incumbent Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Congo and, more particularly, infringed the immunity from criminal jurisdiction and the inviolability then enjoyed by Mr. Yerodia under international law. Those acts engaged Belgium's international responsibility. The Court considers that the findings so reached by it constitute a form of satisfaction which will make good the moral injury complained of by the Congo.

76. However, as the Permanent Court of International Justice stated in its Judgment of 13 September 1928 in the case concerning the Factory at Chorzów:

> "[t]he essential principle contained in the actual notion of an illegal act — a principle which seems to be established by international practice and in particular by the decisions of arbitral tribunals — is that reparation must, as far as possible, wipe out all the consequences of the illegal act and reestablish the situation which would, in all probability, have existed if that act had not been committed" (P.C.I.J., Series A, No. 17, p. 47).

In the present case, "the situation which would, in all probability, have existed if [the illegal act] had not been committed" cannot be re-established merely by a finding by the Court that the arrest warrant was unlawful under international law. The warrant is still extant, and remains unlawful, notwithstanding the fact that Mr. Yerodia has ceased to be Minister for Foreign Affairs. The Court accordingly considers that Belgium must, by means of its own choosing, cancel the warrant in question and so inform the authorities to whom it was circulated.

77. The Court sees no need for any further remedy: in particular, the Court cannot, in a judgment ruling on a dispute between the Congo and Belgium, indicate what that judgment's implications might be for third States, and the Court cannot therefore accept the Congo's submissions on this point.

Of Heroes and Villains, Angels and Demons: The ICC-AU Tension Revisited

DIRE TLADI*

ABSTRACT: The article re-visits the AU-ICC tension from the lens of the hero-villain trend. It considers the main themes in the AU-ICC debate, namely whether the International Criminal Court is targeting Africans and the question of immunity, in the light of the arguments made by the respective interlocutors of the ICC and the African Union. It adopts, as a starting point, the position that the idea that one side is wrong and the other side is right (referred to as the hero-villain approach), is overly simplistic and proceeds to show how complex the issues relating to the AU-ICC tension are. In sum, the article questions both the ICC's claim to neutrality and the AU's claim of champion of decolonisation. The article concludes with a postscript to account for the Prosecutor's recent decision to seek an investigation into the situation in Afghanistan.

I. Introduction

When asked by the editors of the German Yearbook of International Law to make a contribution to the discussion on the International Criminal Court (ICC)-Africa relations in this Forum Section, my immediate reaction was that the African-ICC relations question has been largely overshadowed in the last two years by the ICC-South Africa relations and was thus passé.[1] Yet, in many ways the South Africa-ICC relationship is a microcosm of the Africa-ICC tensions. I have thus gladly accepted to make a contribution.

In previous contributions on this subject, I have questioned the dominant trend in which the debate on ICC-African Union (AU) is characterised by an ideological chasm that has villains pitted against protagonists.[2] In this characterisation, both sides (and their respective interlocutors) describe themselves as heroes fighting the good fight and the other side as evil villains intent on wanton destruction.[3] In the context of the AU-ICC debate, the ICC and its interlocutors present themselves as the defenders of accountability and justice while depicting the AU and its interlocutors as promoting impunity. They claim that, in the pursuit of justice, the ICC does not bend to politics and concerns itself with only law.[4] The AU and its interlocutors, on the other hand, see themselves as the defenders of sovereign equality of States and the ICC and its interlocutors as promoting neo-imperialism and the dominance of the weak by the powerful. They argue that the ICC's claim of objective application of law is nothing more than a cloak to cover the politically motivated bias of the ICC.

My view is that this hero-villain trend is overly simplistic. A dispassionate review of the accounts, decisions, literature, and facts surrounding the ICC will reveal that
